PREFACE.

TO shew that one supreme, omnipotent, eternal God created the universe, that his superintending providence preserves and governs all things; that his wisdom regulates and controls all events; that the smallest as well as the largest are equally the objects of his care; that "not a sparrow falleth to the ground without his notice, and even the hairs of our heads are all numbered," is the great object of this work—but more particularly of the first part.

To accomplish this object with the most forcible demonstration, I have shewn the great designs of God in the government of men, by unfolding a succession of prophecies, by which he announced a grand succession of events, from the fall of man down to this day, and to the end of the world.

To enforce conviction, I have recorded a narrative of the most important events which have fulfilled these prophecies, in regular succession, from the first promise of God to Adam, down to this day, as they stand recorded by the most approved historians. In this narrative it clearly appears, that all the historians, through all ages of the world, have done no more than record the will and government of God, as predicted by his inspired prophets, hundreds and thousands of years before they were accomplished.

To render the design of this narrative as clear and forcible as possible, I have not only confined it to those nations who were the immediate subjects of the prophecies, but to such parts of their history, as immediately regard the accomplishment of these great events. That part of the history of the four great empires, noticed in the great image of Nebuchadnezzar, and Daniel's four beasts, as regards their governments, laws, manners and customs, together with a sketch of the history of the other great kingdoms and empires, not immediately connected with the prophecies, I have noticed separately, by way of Appendix.

All prophecy was given by inspiration of God, and all ancient prophecy through the prophets of the ancient Jewish Church, which sprang from the family of Abraham, and regarded those nations only, which were connected with the Jewish history. This was all that was necessary,—both in its extent and duration—to shew that the government of God is both universal and eternal.

The history of the other great nations is of importance to be known and studied, as ancient monuments of wisdom, virtue, patience, fortitude, industry, arts and arms—and their systems and maxims of government, have proved useful and important models to after ages; have led to the improvements of the age in which we live, and to the perfection of that well balanced system of government which we enjoy.

The luxury and corruptions which followed all the great conquests; the prostration of the virtues by those very corruptions, and the general licentiousness which followed in their train, together with factions, discord, weakness and ruin, which ever closed the political scene, ought to serve as so many beacons, to guide us, and all after ages, in the way of wisdom, virtue, and duty, and to guard us against the calamities of licentious ambition, which have invariably proved their ruin.

The economy of the governments of the Assyrian, Chaldean, Median and Persian Monarchies, are very partially known to us—they were not only absolute monarchies, but from the rude and barbarous ages in which they were founded, we have reason to conclude their systems were very limited, and that the whole depended very much upon the will of the king, with this exception, that the king could not change even his own will when once it became a law.

The union of all these kingdoms stood upon the same basis, under the Medo-Persian Empire. This system was sufficient to protect a rising state, whilst virtue ruled, but had no powers to save a nation when sinking under licentiousness and corrupt ambition.

All the renowned wisdom of the philosophers and legislators of Greece and Rome could do no more, with all their boasted systems of liberty. They in their turn all fell a prey to licentious ambition. The kingdom of Egypt, with all the boasted wisdom and virtue of her ancient institutions, fell a prey to all-conquering lust and ambition.

M565069

As we trace this great subject through the two succeeding parts of this work, we shall find that all the kingdoms of Europe are under the same condemnation, together with the Turkish Empire, whose broad basis stands upon the ruins of all the ancient states and empires.

How far that true balance of power, which constitutes the basis of the English and American governments, may be able to control ambition, licentiousness and corruption, and preserve the governments and liberties of the nations; remains to be tested by experience.

In the first part of this work I have endeavored to shew the happy and prosperous state of the Jews under their theocracy, and that their wretchedness commenced with their kingly government, in connection with their false religion. I have endeavored to illustrate the character of the Grecian and Roman Republics, and shew how a corrupt religion and a want of the true balance of power in the third estate in the government opened the way for factions, which proved their ruin.

In the second part, I have endeavoured to shew how the overbearing ambition of the Roman empire proved its own ruin, and how the distresses she had inflicted upon other nations recoiled back upon herself, until luxury and refinement were swallowed up and lost in ignorance and barbarism—also, what struggles men had to endure to rise out of barbarism into a state of civil refinement.

In the pursuit of this subject I have endeavoured to shew how much the happiness and misery of men depend upon individual character, and have illustrated this in the characters of Alfred the great, contrasted with William I.—styled the conqueror; of Edward III. contrasted with Edward IV.; Queen Elizabeth and Queen Ann. contrasted with James II. and Charles I. and II. and in this way have shewn how England emerged from the Feudal system, and acquired the supremacy of the three estates in her government—the excellency of this government I have endeavoured to shew, in the wonderful display of wisdom, order, happiness, peace and prosperity in the American Republic.

In the third part I have endeavoured to shew the character of the republics of Poland and of France, and to render it plain and intelligible, that republics without the balance of power in the three estates, soon become the nurseries of factions, and that the licentiousness of liberty cherishes the strife of party, until some idol chief strips the people of their rights, and becomes their despot.

I have drawn at full length the characters of Charles XII. and Bonaparte, to illustrate the more strikingly the worth of the character of Peter the Great of Russia, of Frederick the Great of Prussia, and Alexander the Great of Russia—but more immediately the true worth of Washington.

It has been my first object through the whole work to shew the influence and importance of religion—to contrast the pure religion of the Jews with the idolatry of the ages in which they maintained the purity of their church. To contrast particularly the religion of Christ and his Apostles, with the religion of the Popes and Mahomet; and to shew that Martin Luther was the angel of the gospel for the age in which he lived, and will continue to be the angel of the gospel until the millennial day, through the medium of the heralds of the cross in the protestant cause.

As this work is designed immediately for the use of schools, instructors may avail themselves of the chronological table of contents to frame questions for examination, instruction by lectures upon the maps, or otherwise.

SKETCHES OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

PART FIRST,

FROM THE CREATION, TO THE SUBVERSION OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE, 1450.

CHAP. I.

History—its divisions and use—from the creation to the flood —from the flood to the Building of Nineveh and Babylon.

HISTORY is the great medium by which we are enabled to perpetuate the occurrence of events—and through which we may take a retrospective view of those that are past.

It may be divided into four great parts, history before the flood, termed antediluvian, history since the flood termed postdiluvian : history from the flood to Christ, termed ancient, and since Christ, termed modern history. All that is written by the immediate inspiration of God, is termed sacred ; such is the history of the bible : all other history comes under the general denomination of profane.

It furnishes a vast field of moral and religious instruction, and is designed to amuse the imagination, improve the understanding, correct the judgment, and mend the heart by leading us up to God, as the great author, preserver and governor of all things.

That which first claims our attention, in the annals of time, magnitude, of any that had been attempted since the flood. At this, they wrought unchecked forty years, when God in judgment, suffered them to go no farther, but put an end to their work by confounding their speech.

Here was the origin of the confusion of tongues, from whence arose all the variety of language, which has appeared upon the earth. Here Nimrod, who was a mighty hunter before the Lord, laid the foundations of the renowned city of Babylon, in the year of the world 1771. This city stood at the confluence of the rivers Euphrates and Tigris : was walled in the year 1730, and became the famous capital of the Chaldean Monarchy. About the year 1770, Ninus built Nineveh, the subsequent capital of the Assyrian Monarchy. During this period, of about 1800 years, the employment of men, and the state of society, had probably continued the same.

These two great cities soon acquired a degree of wealth, influence and power, which produced the same effects upon society and the world, as have been witnessed, in the history of all the great cities which have appeared : the same change of manners, habits and customs : the ferocity, barbarity and uncultivated state of the hunters and shepherds, began to receive a polish and refinement, by their intercourse with the city. The same lust of pleasure, wealth and power, began to appear. Each, in their turn, extended their conquest over the neighboring countries, until they gave law to all the eastern world. During this whole period, men were without the knowledge of God, and were sunk in the most barbarous and absurd idolatry.

CHAP. II.

From the call of Abraham and his family, to the death of Joseph his Great-Grandson in Egypt.

About 417 years after the flood, God saw the corruption of all that eastern world ; and that they had lost the knowledge and worship of the true God. He then called Abraham from Ur of the Chaldees, near the plains of Shinar ; and directed him to go out into a wild uncultivated desert, lying to the west, near the borders of the Mediterranean sea, and there settle. Abraham obeyed the command, "went out into this remote land ; by permission, took with him Lot, his brother's son, and formed a new settlement.

Here God began to make a new display of himself to Abraham and to the world. Here he unfolded his promises to Abraham. 1st. That he would give to him and his posterity the land, when as yet he had no children. 2d. That his seed should sojourn in a strange land ; be evil treated 400 years, and then be restored to their own land. He gave him a son, in a miraculous manner ; and although he was the heir of promise, God ordered him to sacrifice the lad. When he had so far obeyed the command, as to erect the altar, and raise the knife for execution ; the voice of God exclaimed ; " Lay not thine hand upon the lad." And Abraham caught a ram in a thicket and sacrificed it to the Lord.

Thus having tried the faith of Abraham, abolished through him the ancient custom of human sacrifice, which was common in the land of his fathers ; and having taught his people in all generations of the world, although he slay them to trust in him ; he prospered Abraham greatly in the land, gave him flocks and herds, and made him lord of great possessions.

When Isaac, the child of promise was born, Abraham drove out Hagar his maid, with Ishmael her son, to wander in the desert : that Ishmael, upon whom the angel had pronounced this prophecy before he was born, that " he should be a wild man, his hand should be against every man, and every man's against him, and yet he should dwell in the presence of all his brethren"—that Ishmael, for whose sake God gave this consolation to Hagar his mother, in her distress in the desert. " Take the lad in thine hand, for I will make him a great nation." Ishmael and Hagar his mother, went out accordingly ; and in him, and his posterity, the prophecy has been literally accomplished. The Arabs are a thieving, robbing, plundering race to this day, and have never been conquered.

When Isaac arrived at the age of manhood, Abraham sent out his servant to the land of his fathers, and took for him Rebecca, his brother's daughter to wife, by the special direction of God. By her he had two sons, Esau and Jacob. Abraham lived to a good old age, died, and was buried in his own tomb, which he bought of Ephron the Hittite, for a family spulchre. Esau married one of the daughters of the land, and united the employment of hunting with that of husbandry ; but Jacob became a husbandman, and kept his father's flocks. To Esau were born sons and daughters ; and to Jacob twelve sons, who became heads of the twelve tribes of Israel.

The history of Esau and Jacob, is recorded in the book of Genesis. There also is recorded the art of Rebecca, to obtain the blessing for Jacob her favorite son, in exclusion of the rightful heir ; the death and sepulture of good old Isaac, and the strife and bitterness of Esau against Jacob. As Jacob increased in his family and wealth, he increased in favor with God ; and by wrestling with the angel, he obtained the blessing, with the name of Israel : also the mark of the withered thigh, by the hand of the angel ; which has caused the Hebrews, his descendants, to exclude the thigh of all animals, as improper food, to this day.

When the twelve sons of Jacob or Israel, grew into life, their father cherished an unguarded partiality towards Joseph, one of the younger sons, which excited a jealousy and resentment, on the part of his brethren. This, together with some extraordinary dreams, which Joseph imprudently related, increased their resentment to hatred, and malice, which led them to revenge upon Joseph, by selling him to the Ishmaelites, (or Arabs) and to deceive his father by a false report that he had been devoured by wild beasts ; this they confirmed by shewing his bloody coat ; a barbarous stratagem practised on their father, by dipping the coat in the blood of a kid.

These Ishmaelites carried Joseph down into Egypt, where they sold him as a slave. Here an impious attempt was made upon his virtue, by his master's wife ; which to her severe disappointment, and mortification, he resisted. This led her falsely to accuse him to his master, who threw him into prison. God permitted these daring acts of outrage and cruelty, to shew, for our instruction, that he always can, and often does, bring the greatest blessings out of the heaviest afflictions, and, to increase our confidence in him.

Here, while immured in the walls of a prison, God opened the way for the deliverance of Joseph. When one of his fellow prisoners who was of the king's household, related a singular dream, Joseph was instructed by God in the interpretation—which was accomplished in a very extraordinary manner. This came to the ears of the king, who soon had occasion to send for Joseph to interpret his own dream, of the seven fat and seven lean kine.*

This interpretation procured for Joseph the favor, and confidence of the king : raised him to power, and brought him near the throne. When the seven years of famine, represented by the seven lean kine, had extended into the land of Canaan, where the father of Joseph dwelt, he sent ten of his sons into Egypt to buy corn.

The manner in which they were received ; the stratagem of Joseph, to punish them, and bring down his younger brother ; the second journey of his brethren, the severity of Joseph's treatment of them, the painful sensations of his own breast, the disclosure of himself to his brethren, his sending for his aged father with all his household, and supporting them in Egypt ; are all recorded in the close of the book of Genesis, in a striking and pathetic manner, not to be expressed by any other pen. This interesting narrative, so full of moral and religious instruction, should be familiar to all, at an early age.

When the fulness of time was come, that the good old Jacob should be gathered, as a shock of corn fully ripe ; he remembered the promise of God to his grandfather Abraham, that his posterity should sojourn in a strange land, and be evil entreated 400 years : he called together his sons, and gave them his prophetic blessing,† and charged them to convey his remains to the land of his fathers, and deposit them in the family tomb.

This command was faithfully executed, with all that solemnity and respect, due to the best of fathers ; and the family returned into Egypt, where they continued to increase and multiply, under all their former prosperity.

Here again, the interesting determination of Divine providence is acknowledged. The dream of Joseph, which was so offensive to his brethren, was accomplished. Their former sin in selling him into Egypt, now stared them in the face ; and they, fearing his power and vengeance, after the death of their father fell prostrate before Joseph, and poured out their confessions, and sought his protection.‡

Again the meekness, gentleness and benevolence of Joseph were displayed : again he drew a veil over the wickedness of his brethren, ascribed all to God, and taught them to notice his special providence in their deliverance : again, he restored them to his favor, and lived to see the third generation of Benjamin, his beloved brother. And when the fullness of time was come, that he should be gathered to his fathers, he called his brethren and said—" I die, and God will surely visit you and bring you out of this land, to the land which he sware unto Abraham, Isaac and Jacob." And when he had taken their oath, that they would carry his bones with them, he fell asleep.

CHAP. III

From the death of Joseph to the call of Moses—the plagues in Egypt, the departure of the Hebrews, under Moses and Aaron, and the destruction of Pharaoh at the Red Sea.

HERE begins a new era in the history of the family of Abraham. The Patriarchs are gone ; Joseph is gone ; and their descendants are left unprotected in a strange land. God continued to increase and bless them, till a new king arose, who knew not Joseph. This king, unmindful of the protection the kingdom had received in the time of the famine ; and fired with ambition, began to exercise despotic power, and oppress the descendants of Jacob.

When they became numerous, fearing that his oppression might excite them to revolt, he commanded all their male children to be destroyed at the birth ; an act of cruelty and barbarity, not before recorded in the annals of man. This order was executed, except in the instance of Moses, who was hid by his mother, in an ark of bulrushes, in the flags of the river, where he was preserved by the special providence of God. The daughter of Pharaoh, in her walk discovered the child, and sent for a nurse, which, in the same providence proved to be the child's mother.

Nursed under the guardian care of the princess, Moses grew into life, and was educated in all the wisdom and science of the Egyptians ; and at the same time, was instructed by his mother, that he was an Hebrew, of the family of the bondmen of the land. When he became a man, he went into the field to visit his brethren ; and seeing an Egyptian offer to one of them violence and wrong, he slew him. When this act was known, Moses fled into Midian, (a land on the east of Egypt,) where he married the daughter of Jethro, priest of Midian, and kept his father's flocks.

Here began the displays of the majesty of Heaven ! Here the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob began to have compassion on the distresses of his afflicted children in Egypt. Knowing that his prediction of 400 years of sojourning were nearly accomplished, here he appeared to Moses in the midst of a burning bush ; and called and commissioned him, from the midst of that flame, which concealed the God, but consumed not the bush.

Here he charged Moses to go into Egypt, and deliver his people : and permitted him to take with him Aaron his brother. Here he confirmed the commission of Moses, by the special miracle, of turning his rod into a serpent ; and predicted the manner in which his people should at their departure, spoil the Egyptians of their treasures of gold and silver, as some compensation for their painful service.

Empowered by this high commission, and the miraculous displays of divine power, Moses took with him Aaron, went down into Egypt, and stood before Pharaoh. When he had opened the commission of heaven to the king, he received from Pharaoh this haughty reply, " Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice and let Israel go ? I will not let the people go." In reply to the insolence of this haughty king, Moses cast down his rod, and it became a serpent.

Then Pharaoh, to try the strength of this miracle, sent for his magicians and sorcerers, who cast down their rods and they became serpents ; but the serpent of Moses' rod swallowed up all theirs. This did not open the heart of the king, but confirmed him in his purpose not to let them go. Then God came out in judgment against Pharaoh, by the ten successive plagues which he caused Moses to inflict upon the land of Egypt, fire, blood, and death. (Ex. 8th and 9th ch.)

In this awful manner the judgments of heaven were displayed, through this impious king, upon his guilty land : to inspire the Hebrews with that confidence in God, and in Moses and Aaron, which should unite them in their departure. He caused Pharaoh, also to double the tasks of the Hebrews, that their oppressive bondage might constrain this union, and that he might make such a display of himself and his judgments, as should lead Pharaoh, and the world, to acknowledge, that "the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

When God had put forth his hand and touched all the first born of the land; when every house was filled with mourning, lamentation and wo: then the hard heart of this haughty king was subdued. Then the prince and people were ready to drive out the Israelites. Here commenced the solemn festival of the Jewish passover, in commemoration of their wonderful deliverance; which continues to this day in the Jewish Church. Here was fulfilled the promise, that they should be enriched with the spoils of the Egyptians, by their jewels of gold and of silver.

When all things were now accomplished, this mighty host of 600,000 souls assembled under Moses and Aaron, and took up their departure for the land of their fathers.—Here again, was a display of the selfishness and corruption of the human heart. Notwithstanding all the manifestations God had made of himself to Pharaoh, and to the people, in the miracles he had wrought, and the judgments he had inflicted upon them: he repented that he had let the people go: raised an army, pursued after them by the way of Pihahiroth, and overtook them between Migdol, and the Red Sea, where God had ordered them to encamp.

Here was the closing scene! the waters of the sea, opened to the right hand, and to the left, by the mighty power of the Most High; and Moses led the host of Israel through on dry land. Pharaoh attempted to pursue, when the waters returned by the same Almighty power, with which they were rolled back: and this daring, hardened, impious king, with all his mighty army, were swallowed up and lost in the depths of the sea. At the same time, Moses assembled the host of Israel, on the banks of the sea, where they united in a song of praise to God their deliverer.*

CHAP. IV.

From the passage of the Red Sea, to the giving of the Moral Law at Mount Sinai—the death of Moses and Aaron—the possession of the land of Canaan, under Joshua--and the change of government under their kings.

HERE let us reflect, upon the awful, sublime, and interesting scenes through which we have passed, from the creation to the flood ; from the flood to the call of Abraham ; and from that call to the wonderful displays of God in Egypt, and the Red Sea, and learn this lesson : that when God calls sinners to repentance, by his counsels, warnings, invitations and chastenings ; and they, like Pharaoh, continue obstinate and impenitent ; he will come out against them in his wrath, and seal up their doom with his eternal judgments. The lesson before us is a striking display of this solemn truth.

We will now pass over the several movements of the camp of Israel, until they pitch before Sinai. Here again, the majesty of heaven was displayed in the thunders of Sinai. But notwithstanding the mountain was on fire from the presence of God, when he called Moses, and conversed with him forty days : notwithstanding he had led their whole march, by a pillar of cloud by day, and of fire by night : yet even here, under the awful solemnities of Sinai, they caused Aaron to make a golden calf, (one of the gods of Egypt) of the same ear-rings which they had borrowed of their neighbors ; and after the custom of the Egyptians, worshipped it, in a riotous, tumultuous manner.

This was a scene which tried the patience of Moses. Although he was the meekest of men, at the sight of this scene, he threw down the two tables of stone, on which were inscribed by the finger of God, the Moral Law ; and brake them in pieces. He next dissolved the golden calf, compelled its worshippers to drink it, and caused 3000 idolaters to be slain. He again, by the divine command returned into the mount, where he received two other tables of stone as before ; which are the ten commandments (called the moral law) continued in the Jewish church, and handed down to us.

We will pass over the mercies and judgments of God to this people, in their several journeyings in the wilderness, until we come to the waters of Meribah. Here the murmurings and discontent of this obstinate, ungrateful people, again tired the patience of Moses, and he gave that offence to God, which deprived him and Aaron of the enjoyment of the promised land. Soon after the offence at Meribah, God called Aaron to seal up his last account. After Moses had led the people through the wilderness, God directed him to appoint Joshua his successor, and go up to the top of Pisgah, where he could view the promised land, and there die.

Full of instruction is the sacred book of God. If Moses, the favoured of heaven, was denounced and cut off for one unguarded offence, to what punishment does the whole family of man stand exposed every moment, from the offended majesty of heaven ! Learn also, that to whom much is given, of him much will be required ; and that every man must be accountable for what he hath, and not for what he hath not.

We will now leave Moses entombed on mount Nebo, and follow the camp of Israel, under Joshua, to the river Jordan. Here Jehovah again displayed his mighty power, the river opened, as at the Red Sea, and gave them passage. The first city that presented itself, was Jericho ; strongly walled and fortified. This intimidated the murmuring, complaining, faithless multitude. And when they saw the hardy, warlike, gothic race of men which dwelt in the land, their hearts sunk within them, and they were ready to yield to fear. Again the hand of the Most High was stretched forth for their relief. By the special command of God, the walls of Jericho fell down at the blowing of rams' horns, by the priests, and the city fell an easy conquest to Joshua. This event inspired the host of Israel with confidence ; and their enemies in their turn were depressed, and became an easy prey.

Here end the 400 years sojourning, predicted by Abraham, and the 40 years wandering in the desert. Again, the family of Jacob (or Israel) are restored to the promised land, a land flowing with milk and honey ; abounding with every thing delightful to the eye, and pleasing to the taste.

It must not be understood that the whole family of Jacob, which came out of Egypt, returned to this land of promise. All who were over twenty years of age when they came out, were not permitted to carry with them, the corrupt and idolatrous practices of Egypt, (in which they had been educated,) into the land of Canaan. These all died in the wilderness ; but the youth, together with such as were born in the wilderness, were trained up, by the special displays of God's providence and goodness, to enjoy the promised inheritance.

When these had taken possession of the country, under Joshua, they divided up the land by tribes, side by side, as the United States are divided : established their government, which was a pure Theocracy ; the moral law, together with their ritual, formed their constitution, and God was their head. Under this form of government, they continued 350 years ; and had they been content with their condition, they might have been the happiest people on earth.

But they, like Jeshurun, waxed fat and kicked ; the voice of murmur and discontent, continued to rise up to heaven against them ; they lusted after the idols and corruptions, of the neighbouring nations ; and had not the same power, which brought them into the land, been exerted in protecting them from the corruptions of their own hearts, and the sword of their enemies, they would soon have fallen a prey to them, and returned back to the idoltry of the Chaldeans, their fathers. The promises of God are sure ; fixed and unalterable are his purposes. Although he sometimes gives up his people to the indulgence of their evil propensities ; he always makes their trials subservient to his own glory, and their best good. .

REMARKS.

WE have now accompanied Abraham and his posterity, from Chaldea to Canaan, to Egypt, through their sufferings, their deliverance, their journeyings in the wilderness, and their restoration to the land which God swore unto Abraham, to give to him and his, for a possession, when as yet he had no child. We have, through the instrumentality of this wonderful family, witnessed the manifestation of the knowledge and character of the only true God, in the miraculous birth of Isaac, in the faith of Abraham at the sacrifice, in the accomplishment of the prophecy upon Ishmael, in the narrative of Joseph, in the displays of God to Moses, in the plagues of Egypt, in the deliverance of the Hebrews at the Red Sea, and the destruction of Pharaoh ; in the journeyings of 600,000 souls in a barren uncultivated desert, fed by the immediate hand of God, with quails and manna from heaven ; and with water in the same miraculous manner, from the dry and flinty rock.

We have also witnessed the displays of the majesty of Jehovah, in giving the Moral Law at Mount Sinai, in forming his true church with their service ; together with the judges of Israel, upon the basis of this law ; and finally, his leading the young stock, (after destroying all the old idolaters in the wilderness,) into the land which he had promised to their fathers, and in planting that church which he had not only formed, and nursed, by the special displays of his almighty power and wisdom, by so many miracles, but which he delighted to honor with his special presence, guidance, and direction, and to preside over as its head, deliverer, and protector. “ I am the Lord your God, who hath brought you out of the land of Egypt, and out of the house of bondage, to give unto you this goodly land, which I sware unto your fathers, to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and to their seed after them ; a land flowing with milk and honey.”

Here in the midst of this renewed paradise of blessings, we are called to witness the high and distinguished privileges of that church from whence issued the accomplishment of all the promises to fallen and ruined man.

The scenes of Eden were here renewed, every thing pleasing to the eye, and delightful to the taste, in the richest profusion, gladdened the hearts of this favored church ; the presence and counsels of God directed their steps, the wisdom of God gave them understanding, and from his special bounty their cup overflowed with blessings ; all but Eden's innocence was here.

But here too we are called to witness again the depravity of the heart of man, and say, “ it is desperately wicked, who can know it ;” even here this chosen church, this favored of heaven, amidst the satiety of enjoyment, renounced their God, and demanded a king, like the nations of the earth ; and God left them to the lusts of their hearts, and in his wrath gave them a king.

This demand of God that he should give them a king, was a renunciation of God their king, and like the apostacy of paradise, laid the foundation for all their sufferings, and prepared the way for all their subsequent calamities.*

They, like the first stock in paradise, fell, and entailed upon themselves and their posterity, many calamities, distresses and judgments, and stand as a living monument to all succeeding generations ; with this awful memento. “ Let him that standeth take heed lest he fall.”

* See the chronicles of their kings.

CHAP. V.

Dispersion of the Ten Tribes by Psalmanazer—Remarks.*

WHEN the people of God were weary of his government, and asked a king, He granted their request, and gave them a king in his wrath. Samuel the prophet, by divine permission, anointed Saul as their first king; but God for his disobedience rejected him, and by the special display of his power, appointed David the shepherd king, from which stock sprang the Messiah.

God adapts all his means to their special ends. By the sword of David, He established the defence and security of his people. From him sprang Solomon, who in his wisdom erected the temple at Jerusalem, established the splendor of the temple worship, adorned and beautified the city, and placed the nation on the summit of renown. The lustre of the Jewish nation, shone conspicuous in his reign, throughout the world.

When this illustrious king was called to sleep with his fathers, and his son Rehoboam had succeeded him, he by one unguarded act, severed the nation, ten tribes against two. The exclamation of Jeroboam, "To your tents, O Israel," established Samaria, as the capital of the ten tribes, with Jeroboam for their king; in opposition to Jerusalem, and the two tribes under Rehoboam. The divided strength of a family or nation, is a sure pledge of their weakness, to the first enemy who may be disposed to invade them.

The truth of the remark was soon verified in this divided, fallen family. When the ten tribes had set up the calves of Dan and Bethel, and proclaimed "these be thy Gods, O Israel"—then the God of their fathers came out in judgment against them; and sent Psalmanazer king of Assyria, with a mighty army; who overran their country, pillaged and razed their cities, and carried them all away captive to Nineveh, where they were swallowed up, and their name was blotted out from the list of nations.

Moses having foreseen, by the inspiration of God, the destruction that should come upon his people, gave them seasonable warning.* In this admonition, the sins which caused this calamity, together with their dispersion, are clearly pointed out; and as the same chapter, also promises their restoration in the latter days; great search has been made for them, throughout the habitable globe, but no traces of them have yet been found.

By some, it has been conjectured, that they passed in a body, through the wilds of Asia, crossed Beering's Straits, on to the continent of America, and are to be found in our western Indians. The plausible grounds for this conjecture are, the similarity in their notions of the Supreme Being, their guttural language, together with some manners and customs, and their divisions into tribes.

Dr. Buchanan, in his Asiatic Researches, points out some features in the Affghans in Asia, together with reports of tradition, that they are descendants of the ten tribes; but he does not appear to attach much confidence to the conjecture. All the prophets are agreed in the restoration of this branch of the family of Israel, to the land of their fathers, in the latter days. God will assuredly accomplish his promise; but when, and in what manner, time alone can unfold. "Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to, the one thousand three hundred and thirty-five days." Dan. xii. 12.

The tribe of Judah, together with the small remains of the tribe of Benjamin, who had escaped the punishment of the sword, which God inflicted upon them by the hands of their brethren, for their impiety and barbarity; continued the temple worship at Jerusalem, under a succession of kings, two hundred and fifty years; then they filled up the measure of their iniquities, by violating the sabbath and the sanctuary.

CHAP. VI.

Destruction of Nineveh—Conquest of Nebuchadnezzar—Siege of Tyre—Conquest of Egypt—Captivity of the two tribes—Displays of God in Babylon.

ABOUT one hundred and fifty years after the conquest and captivity of the ten tribes, by Psalmanazer king of Nineveh; God raised up the Chaldeans, together with the Medes, (a nation on the east of Babylon, and not far remote,) to chastise the city of Nineveh for her idolatry, and cruelty to his people. These mighty nations overran their kingdom, laid waste their country, took the city of Nineveh, razed it to its foundation; so that her place is not to be found, according to the predictions of Nahum.

Thus fell great Nineveh, the pride of the east and the conqueror of the west, whose sword had drenched in blood the cities of Palestine, and ruined the ten tribes of the family of Israel.

This conquest of the kingdom of Assyria, raised Babylon, and opened the way for all her future greatness. She extended her arms into the east, and harrassed the Medes and Persians with distressing wars. She carried her arms into the west under Nebuchadnezzar, who overran all Asia Minor, entered Phenecia, and laid siege to the city of Tyre. This city then stood upon the main land, was the great mart of Asia with the west, and the richest city in the world. The siege of Tyre made a distinguished figure in this expedition, and the conquest of this coast Nebuchadnezzar a siege of two years. The distresses of this siege were such as had never been experienced; and the Tyrians, by their firm and desperate resistance, caused the prediction of the prophet Ezekiel to be fully verified, "every head shall be bald, and every shoulder pealed."—Chap. xxix. 18, 19.

When the Tyrians found all further resistance would be ineffectual, they removed their families and effects on to an island, about three fourths of a mile from their city; here, by the assistance of their ships, they protected and secured their wealth against all further attempts from the conqueror, and laid the foundation of that city, which became so distinguished in the siege of Alexander, under the name of modern Tyre.

Nebuchadnezzar carried his arms into Egypt, which fell an easy prey to the conqueror; with the spoils of Egypt he enriched his army, and they rioted in the luxuries of Egypt, as a reward for their services at the siege of Tyre.

From Egypt, the conqueror carried his arms into Palestine, overran the country, laid waste the cities, and besieged Jerusalem. The distresses of this siege are as memorable as the siege of Tyre; but the wretchedness of the Jews, surpassed all description. Wasted by the sword, famine and pestilence, those terrible judgments of heaven, they fell a prey to the conqueror, who gave their city up to pillage, carried the remnant of the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, away to Babylon, with the spoils of their city and temple, and swept their country with the besom of destruction.*

When Nebuchadnezzar had settled the conquest of the west, he returned to Babylon with the spoils of Asia Minor, Phœnicia, Egypt, Syria and Palestine, together with the remnant of the family of Israel; Zedekiah their king graced his train.

With the spoils of the west, Nebuchadnezzar greatly enriched and beautified his favorite city, Babylon; then the scourge of the nations, and mistress of the earth, and rioted in the fruits of his conquests; here the bondage of Egypt was again renewed, and the captive sons of Israel became the servants of the king of Babylon, to convert the spoils of Jerusalem and the cities of the west, into the splendor and magnificence of Babylon; but the most dark and mysterious ways of God, are often the means of illustrating the wisdom, goodness and majesty of his character.

When Nebuchadnezzar had disposed of his spoils, and trophies, he caused seven of the princes of Judah to be selected, educated, and trained for the special service of his court, which opened the way for such a display of the power and majesty of God, by a succession of dreams, visions, miracles, judgments, and prophecies, as astonished the king, the nation, and the world; unfolded a succession of events which have employed the pens of all historians from that day to this, and will continue to employ them, to the great consummation of all things.

That same family, who had been the instruments of the displays of the character of God in Egypt, in the wilderness, and in Palestine, were now become the instruments to display the character of the one true God, to that same idolatrous nation from whence he had called Abraham, more than one thousand years before. The wonderful displays of this Almighty power are faithfully recorded in the whole book of the great prophet Daniel, for the instruction and correction of a profligate world.

In the midst of these scenes, God accomplished upon Nebuchadnezzar the vision of the tree, (see Dan. iv. 4, 18,) and when in the pride of his heart he was exulting in the magnificence of his favorite city, saying, "Is not great Babylon which I have built, for the honor of my majesty, and the glory of my kingdom," the finger of God touched him, and he was deprived of his reason, driven from his kingdom, made to take up his abode with the beasts of the field, and did eat grass with the ox seven years.

At the expiration of seven years God restored Nebuchadnezzar to his understanding and his kingdom, and caused the humiliation of the king to praise him. Instead of saying, "Is not this great Babylon which I have built for the honor of my majesty," he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and blessed the most high God; and praised and honored him that liveth for ever and ever, adding, "none can stay his hand, neither may any say unto him what doest thou."

In the various displays of his power in the family of Abraham, God had manifested to the world, why he called Abraham out of the land of Chaldea, into the wilderness of Canaan, inflicted on his posterity the bondage of Egypt, and led them through their forty years journeyings in the wilderness; it was to effect the establishment of his church in the land of their fathers.

By these astonishing displays of his power, he made it manifest to the world, why he blotted out the ten tribes from the list of nations, and carried away the remnant of the two tribes to Babylon, even that he might root out the idolatry of his church, and by his chastisements, and corrections, lead them back to himself, and at the same time, through the instrumentality of his own children, magnify his name amongst the same idolatrous nations, from whence he had called Abraham; extort this confession from Nebuchadnezzar, "that the God of the Hebrews is the only true God;" and this decree of the king, "that all nations and languages under the whole heaven, should honour the God of Daniel, and all people should serve him."

Thus having accomplished his threefold purpose of bringing his church by his corrections, to humility and obedience; magnifying his name and his glory to Nebuchadnezzar and his kingdom, leaving on record these wonderful displays for the instruction of the world to the latest generations; God prepared the way for the restoration of his people, and the rebuilding of the city of Jerusalem.*

CHAP. VII.

—expedition of Darius—of Xerxes—pass of Thermopylæ.*

DURING the displays of divine power in Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar died, and was succeeded by his son, whose reign was short, and next by his grandson Belshazzar. Between him and Cyaxares king of the Medes, a war sprang up, in which Cyrus, king of the Persians, was engaged as an ally: a battle was soon fought, in which the Babylonians were defeated, put to flight with great slaughter, and compelled to sue for peace.

This Cyaxares was about to grant, when Cyrus objected, urging that now was the favourable opportunity to punish the Babylonians for their tyranny and cruelty; and that if the king would entrust him with the command of his army, he would march to Babylon, and chastise that haughty city. Cyaxares, admiring the spirit of this young hero, then twenty-five years of age, yielded to his request, and returned to his court in Media.

Cyrus, who was called by name by the prophet Isaiah, two hundred years before he was born, when that prophet predicted the destruction of Babylon, was now about to enter upon his commission, and execute the decrees of heaven against that city, who had enriched herself with the spoils of nations, who said in her heart, "I sit a queen, I am no widow, I shall see no sorrow," and knew not the judgments God had in store for her, and which he had denounced against her ; and who, to fill up the measure of her iniquities, then held the two tribes of Israel in bondage.

Thus commissioned by God, and armed by his authority, Cyrus entered upon the plains of Shinar, and laid siege to Babylon. The Babylonians, unable to keep the field, had fled, and taken refuge within their walls, where they felt themselves secure, with a store of provision for twenty years.

Cyrus invested the city so closely, that all communication from without was cut off ; he next prepared a canal, by which he could turn the waters of the Euphrates, into the Tigris, and thereby lay bare the channel of the river. During these operations, Belshazzar the king was rioting in his palace, with his wives, his concubines, and all his court, and drinking wine with impious profanation, out of the sacred vessels, his grandfather Nebuchadnezzar had brought from the holy temple of Jerusalem.

A man's hand appeared, and wrote upon the wall, over against the king, these words : mene, tekel, upharsin ; the conscience of the king upbraided him, and his knees smote together with fear. Daniel was called, who thus interpreted the writing ; " Thy days are numbered and finished, thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians."

The same night, amidst this impious festivity, the stratagem of the canal was executed ; the river was drained, and Cyrus entered the city by an unguarded gate, on the side of the river, overturned all in his way, entered the palace, put the king and all his court to the sword, and made himself master of Babylon.

Thus fell great Babylon, the pride and ornament of the Chaldean monarchy, the mistress of the world, and the head of gold in the vision of Nebuchadnezzar ; and thus the empire of Media was established upon the ruins of the Chaldean Monarchy.

Cyaxares, then an old man, and uncle to Cyrus, upon the side of his mother, soon died, and left the crown of Media to Cyrus, as the rightful heir ; thus uniting the three kingdoms of Chaldea, Media and Persia, in one, with Cyrus for its head.

The first act of importance recorded of Cyrus, was his decree for the deliverance, and restoration of the Jews, to the land of their fathers. This decree was accomplished, with the necessary supplies for carrying it into execution ; the seventy years captivity was closed, and the remnant of the two tribes was restored to Jerusalem, to rebuild their city and temple under Zerubabel, and Ezra. See Ezra 1st chapter.

Thus we are led again to see with what precision the decrees of the Most high are accomplished, "that he setteth up kings, and putteth down kings, and none can deliver out of his hand."

Cyrus, thus seated upon the throne of the Medo Persian empire, (which became the breast and arms of silver in the image of Nebuchadnezzar,) was now the greatest monarch the world had ever known; he united the three kingdoms by wise and energetic laws, ruled in wisdom, laid the foundations of that empire which became so conspicuous in succeeding reigns, and died 529 years before Christ.

We will pass over the successive reigns as uninteresting, until we come to the reign of Darius, father of Xerxes; he was fired with the ambition of his ancestors, raised a powerful army, marched into the west, crossed the Hellespont, marched through Thrace, crossed the Danube, and commenced operations against the ancient Scythians of Europe. These hardy sons of the forest, drew him into their wilds, by flying before him, laid waste their country, and harassed him in his march, until he despaired of success, and attempted to retire from the war; the barbarians had succeeded in their stratagem, they fell upon him with great fury, routed, dispersed and destroyed his army, and Darius returned a fugitive into Persia, where he died soon after, leaving his throne to his son Xerxes. He was the prince of Persia described in Daniel's scriptures of truth, "as being far richer than all others, who should stir up all against the realm of Grecia." Chap. xi. 2.

Xerxes assembled a powerful army, amounting to five million souls, (according to Mr. Rollin,) marched into the west, crossed the Hellespont, and invaded the states of Greece, then lying on the eastern borders of Europe, where Turkey in Europe now is.*

Greece was then in its infancy, divided into a number of small states, hordes, or clans, independent of each other, speaking the same language under a variety of dialects; without union, without money, without allies, and unprepared, even for any invasion.

* Appendix, A.

When Xerxes appeared on their borders with his immense host, they began to confederate for common safety. In this, their first effort for defence, they were near being ruined in the choice of a general ; such was the jealousy of these rival sons of liberty. When they were united in this, they were equally ditressed in the choice of a commander for their fleet ; when they were agreed on this also, their numbers were so small as not to be put in competition with the whole eastern world, which was assembled against them.

The powerful force of the king, and the defenceless situation of Greece, inspired him with the highest confidence of success, he constructed a bridge of boats, passed the Hellespont, entered upon the plains of Greece, and penetrated into the heart of their country, without opposition, until he approached the pass of Thermopylæ ; here he was met by Leonidas, with three hundred Spartans, who checked his progress, and held at bay the whole force of Persia.

When Leonidas had learnt that Xerxes was about to force his passage through the by-roads of the mountain, by the aid of a treacherous Greek, and thus enclose his little band, he assembled his three hundred Spartans, put himself at their head, marched through the defile, in dead of night, and, with sword in hand, rushed like a torrent upon the Persian camp, overturning all in his course, until he had nearly reached the tent of the king ; here, amidst the terrible conflict of carnage and of death, they all fell a sacrifice to the swords of the Persians, except one, who was ever after treated by his countrymen as a fugitive, and vagabond, because he preferred life to glory.

This daring and heroic assault, so intimidated the king, that he no longer considered himself safe in the midst of his legions, but betook himself to his fleet, as a place of more safety, and where he hoped much from a naval victory, because it was superior to the Grecian, and left the command of his army with Mardonius, his principal general. Here the Greeks were ready to meet his wishes. The fleets met near Salamin, an action was fought, and a victory obtained, which ruined the Persian fleet. Xerxes escaped, and fled into Persia, and his Queen, by a most masterly stratagem and address, secured her ship, and flight, and followed the king. They both returned safe to Babylon.

Mardonius, with the host of Persia, moved with renewed caution, until the Greeks forced him to a battle at Platea ;

here followed a victory, as glorious on the land, as the former had been on the sea. Mardonius was killed, and of three or four hundred thousand men, of the Persian army engaged, not more than three hundred escaped to return into Persia. Thus ended the greatest enterprize that had ever been attempted, with the greatest overthrow that had ever been witnessed.

The Greeks thus secured from foreign invasion, were left to cultivate their soil, improve the arts and sciences, extend their commerce, and exert their military prowess, in their own private and domestic quarrels, the most distinguished of which was the Peloponnesian war, which lasted twenty-five years.

During these civil broils in Greece, a civil war sprung up in Persia: the younger Cyrus conspired against his brother Artaxerxes, who was upon the throne, passed over into Greece, levied a body of fifteen or twenty thousand troops, and led them into Asia, where he was joined by a large body of Persians, from the province over which he was governor; with this force he marched towards Babylon, to attack the king, who, apprized of the conspiracy, had assembled an army, and gone forth to meet him.

The two armies soon met; a desperate action ensued; the wing of the army, in which the Greeks were posted, was victorious, the wing of the Persian army which engaged them, was routed and fled—the Greeks pursued. At the same time Cyrus, who commanded the centre, discovered his brother Artaxerxes, at the head of his troops, and exclaimed “I see him,” put spurs to his horse, rushed into the thickest of the battle, attended by his guards, and made a desperate assault upon his brother: here, engaged hand to hand, the two heroes fought for the fate of the kingdom, when the stroke of a soldier struck Cyrus dead at the feet of his brother. A terrible carnage ensued; Cyrus’ army was routed, and cut to pieces. The Greeks, who had pursued their victory too far, were cut off from the army, and obliged to trust to the valour of their own swords, for their safety and protection. Thus the insurrection of Cyrus was closed.

Artaxerxes returned to Babylon, and left his principal general, to pursue, and destroy, the remains of the Greeks. Ten thousand of the descendants of the heroes of Thermopylæ, of Salamin, and Plata, were now left, destitute of succour, in the heart of Persia, either to deliver themselves up as captives, and endure the whips and scorn, and mutilations of the Persians ; to fall a desperate sacrifice to their own valour, on the plains of Persia ; or make a desperate retreat into their own country.

They chose the latter ; and this little phalanx, under Xenophon, their leader, retired in presence of the victorious army of Artaxerxes, into the northern provinces of Armenia and Georgia, and from thence over mountains and forests covered with snow, through the uncultivated wilds, and more uncultivated savage nations, all of them in arms ; in the presence of a pursuing army, until they reached the borders of the Black Sea. Here they embarked, and by a passage, not less perilous from the wintry blasts of the north winds, than from the swords of the barbarians, they landed safe near where Byzantium then stood, (now Constantinople,) and passed safely to their own homes, to the inexpressible joy of their friends, and the astonishment of the world.

During these adventures abroad, the Greeks continued to cultivate the arts, enlarge and embellish their cities, perfect the science of letters, and display to the world a succession of the greatest heroes, orators, statesmen and poets, together with the greatest masters in the fine arts, that have ever embellished the world ; until the great Philip, king of Macedon, arose. This prince, artful, subtle, and powerful, aspired to the conquest of the states of Greece, and of the world.

Philip matured his plans, by increasing his treasury, assembling a strong military force, training his invincible Macedonian phalanx, upon new and improved principles, and by lulling the neighboring states into security, by his orators, or by his gold.

When he was about to strike the fatal blow to the liberties of his country, he was killed at a public assembly, by the sword of a young Greek. Thus fell Philip the ambitious ; and through his fall, the liberties of Greece were once more preserved.

Alexander, the son and successor of Philip, upon his access to the throne of Macedon, found himself in possession of all the vast preparations of his father, and being fired with the same ambition, he soon found opportunity to carry into effect all his plans.

Alexander assembled the same army which his father had trained—put himself at its head, and at a blow overthrew the liberties of his country, and erected his standard in triumph over those states, which the gold of his father had lulled into security ; and when he had settled the government of his country, prepared to take vengeance on those haughty Persians, who had, with their legions, outraged the liberties of Greece.

The eloquence of Demosthenes, the wisdom of Solon and Lycurgus, and the boasted democracy of Greece, which taught, that liberty, valor, patriotism, industry, economy, and even frugality were the greatest virtues, had all fallen a sacrifice to the despotic sword of Alexander ; and this young hero, of twenty-five years of age, now rose up like a Colossus to bestride the world.

CHAP. VIII.

Expedition of Alexander—Fall of the Persian Monarchy.

BEFORE we enter upon this extensive expedition, let us consult the sacred volume, and see what commission God had given Alexander, by the mouth of his prophets.

During the reign of the impious Belshazzar king of Babylon, who was slain at the conquest of Cyrus, we find the vision of Daniel the Prophet, of the ram and he-goat, as recorded in the 8th chapter of Daniel. Impressed with the importance of this vision, and the interpretation, let us accompany Alexander across the same arm of the sea, which Xerxes formerly crossed when he invaded Greece, on to the plains of Asia ; let us accompany him to the bank of the Granicus ; (a small river of Asia Minor, which falls into the sea of Marmora,) here he was met by a numerous Persian army to oppose his march.

As soon as Alexander approached the river in view of the Persians, he lost not a moment, but plunged his horse into the river : the whole army followed ; the Persians disputed the passage with their whole force ; the action was desperate, and the victory decisive ; the Persians were routed and fled ; Alexander pursued, and their army was destroyed. This victory, considering the time, place, and circumstances, may be considered as a literal fulfilment of the vision of the Ram.

The fruits of this victory opened an easy passage through Asia Minor ; and Alexander moved without further opposition, until he met Darius the Persian king, at the pass of Cilicia. Here, by a stratagem, he drew Darius into the narrow defiles of the mountains, where numbers could not avail him, and by a desperate action, gained a decisive victory; took and dispersed his army, together with the queen, and household of Darius, with all the treasure of his camp. Darius, with the shattered remains of his army, fled into Persia.

Alexander, after having paid suitable honors, and rendered proper testimonies of respect to the family of Darius, moved his army, by the way of the sea, into Phœnicia, and laid siege to the city of Tyre.

That city which had been built from the ruins of ancient Tyre, formerly taken by Nebuchadnezzar, now stood on an island, the seat of the wealth, and commerce of the world. Here Alexander, like Nebuchadnezzar, met with desperate resistance, and a long and distressing siege; which called forth all the talents of the conqueror, and all the energies of his army; at length valour and perseverance prevailed, the city was carried by assault, and the riches of Tyre were converted into instruments of future conquests.

Alexander pursued his rout into Egypt, which fell an easy prey; here he enriched his army with the spoils of Egypt; caused himself to be worshipped as the son of Jupiter Ammon; and built the city of Alexandria, which still bears his name.

When he had settled the affairs of Egypt, Alexander returned into Asia, finished the conquest of Syria, and appeared before Jerusalem; here the high priest came out to meet the conqueror, clad in all his royal vestments, attended by all his court, and attempted to prostrate himself before Alexander, and do him homage;* but Alexander forbade him, saying, that he had seen in a vision in his own country, a man of his character and appearance, and he treated the high priest with great civility and respect.

When this ceremony was ended, the high priest conducted Alexander into the temple; unfolded, and explained to him all the prophecies, relating to the conquest of Persia; particularly the vision of the ram and he-goat, Daniel's vision of the four beasts, and the dream of Nebuchadnezzar's great image; all which so impressed Alexander, that he was to be the conqueror of Asia, that he took the Jews into his special favor, treated them with great respect and kindness, made them rich presents, gave them his blessing, and then pursued his march to Babylon.

Nothing of importance occurred, during his passage of the mountains lying between Palestine and Babylon : when he came down upon the plains of Persia, he passed the Euphrates in quest of Darius, and came up with him posted upon the banks of the Tigris, surrounded by all his court, and at the head of all the vast armies of Persia, where he awaited the conqueror.

Here opened anew the battle of the Granicus ; Alexander ordered the charge ; plunged into the river at the head of his army ; and encountered perils from the depth of the river and rapidity of the current, such as he had not before experienced ; his army was broken by the stream, and thrown into disorder ; but all this he surmounted, gained the opposite bank, amidst the darts of the Persians ; drew up his army, and commenced the attack.

Darius was routed, his army cut to pieces and destroyed, and he himself fled into Armenia, (a province on the north,) where he was slain by Bessus, governor of Bactria. Alexander pursued and overtook Darius just in time to revenge the insult offered to fallen majesty, by causing Bessus to be mutilated and slain. He then returned, and marched to Babylon, which opened her gates to the conqueror, and here he gave his army repose.

Thus fell the kingdom of Persia ; which arose out of the kingdoms of Chaldea, Assyria, Media, Persia and the kingdoms of the west, which were all united under Cyrus at the conquest of Babylon. Thus fell the head of gold, and the breast and arms of silver, in the great image of Nebuchadnezzar ; thus fell the second great beast in Daniel's vision, and the kingdom of the belly, and thighs of brass was established upon their ruins under the dominion of the he-goat.

Thus ended the kingdoms of Nebuchadnezzar and of Cyrus, which under the vision of the tree, grew and filled the whole earth, and thus was verified the denunciations of the prophet ; " They that lead into captivity, shall go into captivity ; they that kill with the sword, shall be killed with the sword ; " such are the decrees of the Most High, who ruleth in the affairs of the kingdoms of men.

CHAP. IX.

Alexander establishes the empire of the Greeks upon the ruins of the Persian—dies—division of the Grecian Empire—rise of the Roman Empire—of the Carthaginian—their wars—fall of Carthage—revolutions of the Roman Empire.

WHEN Alexander had reposed his army, and settled the government, he took his route through the eastern provinces, which fell an easy prey to the conqueror; built cities after his own name, and settled their governments, until he arrived at the river Indus. He then turned aside, and followed its banks to the Ocean; rejoiced his army once more with a view of the sea; marched into the northern provinces, subdued them in succession, waged war with the Scythians, with great peril, and returned to Babylon; established the government of the Greeks upon the ruins of the Babylonian; but preserved all the splendor, pomp, homage and ceremonies of the Persian court. Thus the vision was fulfilled.

Alexander who had now become a Persian in the midst of his Greeks, gave great offence to those generals, whose valour had led his brave troops to victory, and to conquest; and they dared to express what their hearts so justly opposed; Clytus, his friend who had saved his life, and Calisthenes the brave, fell a sacrifice to the unrestrained fury of the tyrant.

That simplicity of manners, that had nursed that Grecian valor, which had hewn out the way to empire for this conqueror of the world, was now exchanged for Persian pomp and corruption, and the stern Greeks saw their king lost in sensuality.

Having rioted in all the luxuries of eastern pomp, and effeminacy for six years, this he-goat of the west, this son of Jupiter Ammon; this hero of the east; this conqueror of the world; fell a prey to his own licentiousness, and died as a fool dieth, in the excess of his cups.

Here again the scriptures of truth in the 11th chapter of Daniel were fulfilled: his kingdom was divided between his four principal generals, to the exclusion of his own family. Cassander, held Babylon and the provinces of the east; Lysimachus, held Thrace, with Greece and Asia Minor; Seleucus, held Syria; and Ptolemy held Egypt.

The wars of the Seleucidæ in Syria, between the Jews on the north, and the Ptolemies of Egypt on the south, have so exactly fulfilled the prophecies of this 11th chapter of Daniel, that many have supposed they were written after the events ; particularly those which relate to the persecutions of the Jews ; their distresses under Antiochus Epiphanes, his depredations and massacres, together with the destruction of their temple ; his violation of the rights of their holy religion, in causing them to eat swine's flesh ; his profanation of their sanctuary, in causing them to offer it upon their altars to their God. These sacrilegious cruelties have led many to suppose Antiochus to be the type, or forerunner of Antichrist.

These scourges of the church of God, and of the world, continued their depredations down to the conquest of the Romans, about sixty-five years before Christ. The wars between the Syrians and Egyptians, were almost perpetual ; and yet the descendants of Ishmael, who inhabit Arabia, lying partly between the two, dwelt quietly, and were not entangled in their wars. Thus far a fulfilment of the promise of God to Ishmael.

Since the call of Abraham, God has displayed himself to men, by the majesty of his power and goodness, in planting and building up his church ; has rolled on one great event after another, to chastise his own people for their idolatry, and backslidings ; and scourge their enemies for their corruptions, as well as their cruelties to his people and church.

We have witnessed the revolutions of the three great empires of the image of Nebuchadnezzar, and the three first beasts of Daniel's vision ; we have now come down to the fourth kingdom, as expressed by the legs of iron in the image, and the fourth beast of the vision, strong exceedingly, with great iron teeth.

Before we commence this part of our narrative, let us go back and examine the origin of the Romans, or fourth kingdom, and learn their character.

In the year 1480 before Christ, was founded the city of Troy, upon the eastern borders of the sea, now called Archipelago, between the settlements in Asia Minor, and ancient Greece. Paris, son of Priam king of Troy, was guilty of outrage to a Grecian princess ; this kindled a war, and all Greece was in arms to revenge the indignity. Troy was besieged by the Greeks, and at the end of ten years fell a sacrifice to their artful stratagems, and was razed to its foundations—blotted out from the list of cities, and the Trojans from the list of nations. This war called into action the genius of Homer, the father of epic poetry, to celebrate the feats of arms at the siege of Troy.

A small colony sprung from the ruins of this renowned city, under Æneas their leader, passed into Italy, and laid the foundations of the Roman state. In the year 753 before Christ, about the time of the dispersion of the ten tribes into Nineveh, and the east, Romulus who was then their chief, laid the foundations of the city of Rome. This little city, in the midst of a rude, savage country, grew up by incessant wars, at the expense of her neighbours, until it swallowed up all other kingdoms, and gave laws to the world.*

Rome was checked and harassed in her progress by her great rival, Carthage, about four hundred years.

Carthage sprang from ancient Tyre, by a colony, which, in the year 1259 before Christ, in the time of the judges of Israel, was led into Africa, by queen Dido. Her character was like that of the Tyrians, commercial, corrupt, avaricious and practising the idolatry of the ancient Assyrians and Phenicians, with the barbarous custom, or rite, of human sacrifice.

The ambition of the Carthagenians, in their early ages, was carried in their wars, into Spain, Sicily, Rhodes and the isles of the sea. The Greeks were commercial, and checked their depredations in the Archipelago, until the Romans were compelled by these ambitious neighbours, to turn their attention to their fleet.

The city of Carthage, which stood upon the north of Africa, upon the bay where Tunis now stands, was founded about 1233 before Christ, as a rival of Tyre; became the seat of the commerce of the north of Africa, and of the west; but the limits of her territory being so narrowly circumscribed by the great desert of Barca, and the kingdom of Numidia, that she could acquire an extent of territory, only by foreign conquest; this exhausted her treasure, trained her rival to arms, and proved her ruin.

The governments of these states were monarchical; that of Carthage continued; but the government of Rome was changed into a consular government, under their fifth king Tarquin, and the senate, with two consuls, chosen annually, by the people, governed Rome for the space of eight hundred years, and raised her to the summit of her greatness.

The rival strength of these two cities was first called into action, in the contest for the island of Sicily, next carried into Africa, raged with violence by sea and land, twenty-two years, and was closed favourably to the Romans.

tribes, and states, had now to drink of the cup of her own affliction, which grew out of her ambition.

A great question at this time arose at Rome, between her two greatest consuls, Cesar and Pompey, which should rule. This, like all other such questions, led to an appeal to the sword, and a civil war commenced; the great champions collected their armies, and retired into the country of the Greeks; they met at Pharsalia, and an action commenced, the conflict was worthy of the chiefs and their companions in arms; the prize was Rome. Cesar prevailed; Pompey fled to Egypt; the terror of Cesar's arms had gone before him, Egypt durst not give asylum to a Roman fugitive; Pompey landed in Egypt, fell by the hand of the assassin, and thus left to Cesar the quiet possession of Rome, sixty years before Christ.

Ambition had cherished the virtues and liberties of Rome, and laid the foundation of all her greatness. Virtue, liberty, and ambition combined, raised her triumphs over Carthage, with Africa, Europe and Asia, and seated her upon the throne of the world. Here her virtue expired; luxury, effeminacy, and corruption succeeded; jealousy, faction, and a corrupt ambition followed, with all that train of furious passions, which are the life and soul of factions in all states, and armed the nation against herself.

Factions, the bane of all states and empires, when once formed, seldom if ever close, without the triumph of party; and this triumph generally seals the liberties of the people, by the energies of government.

The factions of Rome had long preyed upon the virtues of the state, until they had sown the seeds of corruption amongst the people; and then their chiefs, with the sword, caused them to become the instruments of their own slavery and ruin.

The genius of the Roman government favored the revolution we have witnessed, by placing so great power in the hands of their military chiefs, without a balance of power in the senate to check and control it. This, when regulated by virtue, and foreign conquest, was not only safe, but the great spring which raised Rome to the summit of her glory.

When the virtues of the state, and the ambition of foreign conquest were removed, and faction prevailed, the sword of conquest was turned by Cesar, and Pompey, against the liberties of their country, and filled Rome with butchery and distress; great Cato fell; Pompey fell; that senate which had been the terror and admiration of the world, fell ; the pride and glory of the Roman state, her liberty, fell ; and Cesar was lord of Rome.

DEATH OF CESAR.

A conspiracy had been laid by the Senators, to take the life of Cæsar, and the day on which he was to be offered the crown was affixed for its execution. Accordingly on that day, Cæsar having entered the senate house, and taken his seat, the Senators came near, under pretence of saluting him. Cimlar, who was one of them, approaching him in a suppliant posture, took hold of his robe and held him so as to prevent his rising. Brutus and Cassius (leaders of the conspiracy,) with others, then precipitated their daggers into his body. After defending himself manfully, he fell, having received twenty three wounds, from hands which he vainly supposed had been disarmed by his benefits.

Cesar had triumphed over Pompey, and the liberties of Rome, and was now, imperial dictator in the heart of the world ; but the virtue of Rome was not all gone ; Brutus yet lived, Cassius, Cicero and others had yet survived the fall of Pompey and Cato, and when Cesar had declared that Rome must be imperial, and Cesar the emperor, they slew him in the midst of his senate ; not that Senate which had Cato for its head, he had yielded up his life with the liberties of his country, upon the point of his own sword, and the glory of that senate was lost in the fall of Cato.

The fall of Cesar, opened afresh the civil wars of Rome. Anthony, the friend of Cesar ; Brutus and Cassius, the avengers of their country ; Octavius Cesar, then a youth, the nephew of Julius Cesar, and heir by adoption, set up their claims, and drew the sword.

The struggle between these conflicting interests, was long and severe : Rome bled at every pore ; the field, the block, and the scaffold, wasted the best blood of the nation. In this great struggle, the great Tully fell, under the axe of proscription ; Brutus and Cassius fell ; the battle of Actium sealed the fate of Rome ; Anthony fled to Egypt, where he fell, and young Octavius reigned triumphant, filled the imperial chair of his uncle Julius, and gave peace to the world, under the title of Augustus Cesar.

The temple of Janus was now shut for the first time since it was built ; the golden age of the world had now arrived, and the storm of war was hushed into a long repose.

CHAP. X.

Advent of the Messiah—his life and doctrines, death and resurrection—prophecy upon Jerusalem—destruction of Jerusalem—dispersion of the Jews—division of the Roman Empire—rise of the Papal power.

In this glorious, peaceful reign of Augustus Cesar, the fifth kingdom commenced, Dan. 11—44, 45. and the glorious epoch arrived when the promise of God to Adam was ac-accomplished, "the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." The promise to Abraham, "that in his seed, all the families of the earth should be blessed;"—The promise of good old Jacob, in his blessing to Judah, "the sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be."—The prophecy of Moses: "A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you like unto me," &c.—The vision of Nebuchadnezzar: "And I saw a stone cut out of the mountain without hands, that smote the image upon his feet, and brake them to pieces, and became a great mountain and filled the whole earth;"—The promise of God to the world by all his prophets, was accomplished in this peaceful reign. The star appeared in Bethlehem; the angelic host proclaimed in anthems of praise, "glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men." "Behold! I bring you glad tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people, for unto us is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord." "For unto us a Son is born, unto us a Child is given; and his name shall be called wonderful, counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." In Bethlehem of Judea, the wise men, as directed by the star, witnessed, and published this glorious event, this accomplishment of so many prophecies, through so many ages of the world, the advent of this Alpha and Omega, this bright and morning star;—this key of life, and immortality beyond the grave;—this Saviour of men;—this "Immanuel, God with us."

Great were the displays of God to men, through the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets; infinitely greater have they been through his Son.

In him has been exhibited a perfect pattern for our instruction: love to God, and benevolence to men. A system of miracles which he wrought, fully confirm this truth, "I and my Father are one."

Christ's sermon on the mount, as recorded in the 5th, 6th, and 7th chapters of St. Matthew's gospel, unfold a system of truths, for our moral and religious instruction, worthy the Saviour of men;—Maxims, which if reduced to practice, would make a heaven upon earth. Well might it be said, "He taught as one having authority, and not as the Scribes," "Surely man never spake like this man."

Wonderful were the displays of divine power at his crucifixion ; darkness covered the earth at noon day, the earth shook to its centre, the rocks rent, the graves opened, and many that slept in the dust, sprang into life. The veil of the temple, which had so long concealed this great mystery from the view of men, was rent from the top to the bottom, when he bowed his head in death, and said, " it is finished."

His enemies appalled at the awful sublimity of the scene, exclaimed in the anguish of their hearts, " surely this was a righteous man !"

The resurrection of this key of life, and immortality, beyond the grave, as he had announced to his followers : the declaration of the angels who accompanied his glorious ascension ; " Why stand ye here looking up to heaven ? this same Jesus whom ye now see ascend into heaven, shall come again in like manner, in the clouds of heaven ;" the descent of the Holy Ghost, that promised Comforter, upon his disciples, on the day of Pentecost, and upon all his saints from that day to this ; the exact accomplishment of the judgments Christ denounced against Jerusalem ; " O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings, and ye would not ; behold your house is left unto you desolate ;" His address and prediction to his disciples when admiring the beauty of the temple, " See ye these goodly stones, Verily I say unto you, there shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down,"—All, all claim the faith, reverence, obedience, homage, and adoration of men.

The manner in which he has caused the doctrines and principles that he taught, together with the miracles which he wrought, and the displays of benevolence that he exhibited, in his life, for the instruction of the world, to be transmitted down to us, by the fourfold testimony of his disciples (called evangelists) also his miraculous commission of Saul of Tarsus, (a persecutor of his principles and followers) to go forth as Paul the great apostle of the Gentiles ; that through him the whole world might receive the knowledge of this great truth, " that all things are given by the Father to the Son," and that he hath not only redeemed the world ; but that he shall judge the world ;—All claim the gratitude of men.

So fully were the prophecies of Isaiah viii. and ix. and

Daniel ix. verse 24, and onward, accomplished at the time of the advent of the Messiah, and so fully was he looked for, by the Jewish nation at this time, "that many false Christs appeared and deceived many;" but the pride of the Jews had blinded their eyes, they had overlooked the first advent, when Christ was to appear as a pattern of humility, meekness, patience and benevolence, which should reprove their haughty pharisaical character; and were looking for a prince and a king, who should deliver their nation from Roman bondage, gratify their ambitious pride, and give them the dominion of the world.- This haughty spirit led them to denounce their Saviour, and exclaim, "away with him, crucify him, crucify him; his blood be upon us, and upon our children."

God has taken the forfeiture at their hands: sifted them as wheat among the nations, and caused the prediction of the prophet again to be accomplished in them. "A hiss and a by-word shalt thou be among the nations;" which continues to this day.

Seventy years after the death, resurrection, and ascension of the Messiah; Titus, the son of Vespasian, the Roman emperor, laid siege to Jerusalem with a great army, took their city after a long and distressing siege (in which the sufferings of the Jews were great beyond all former example,) gave it up to pillage, and the sword; butchered, destroyed, and dispersed the inhabitants; razed their temple, and ploughed up its foundations. Thus the avarice of the Jews, who had hid their wealth under the walls of their temple, led to the accomplishment of the ever memorable prophecy of the Messiah upon its ruin. "Not one stone shall be left upon another."

The Romans, so long as they held Syria and Palestine as a province, (four or five hundred years,) treated the Jews with great severity. In the fifth century the Arabians or Saracens entered Palestine, broke down the Roman power, established the Mahometan religion upon the ruins of the Jewish, drove out the remnant that had survived the severities of Roman persecution, and rendered the country a desert.

This deluded, distressed people, once the chosen of God, and favoured of heaven, now became the fugitives, and vagabonds of the whole earth, without character, without country, without government, union, or head; the derision, scorn and jest of the world. They have been these eighteen hundred years scraping together gold as the dust, to be prepared at the call of the Messiah, to return to their own land, rebuild their city and temple, as is predicted by the prophets, and enjoy the triumphs of that glorious day; "when the mountain of the Lord's house shall be exalted upon the tops of the mountains, and all nations shall flow unto it and be saved." Which prediction, will as assuredly be accomplished, as that they exist as a dispersed nation.

God is now causing the Jews, the family of Abraham, to pass through the wilderness of the whole earth, to prepare them by his corrections and judgments, to become the light of the world, when at the second advent of the Messiah, he shall again collect the dispersed of Israel into the land of their fathers; Christ the shechinah, shall illumine their understanding, remove the veil from their hearts, and a nation shall be born to God their Saviour, in a day.

Let us learn instruction from what is before us. "To whom much is given, of them much will be required." If the Jews are thus punished for their infidelity and disobedience, what will be our condemnation, for our disobedience and corruption, under the light of the gospel, with this nation as a living miracle before our eyes, together with all the prophecies, which have been so long, and are every day fulfilling in them, and the nations of the earth.

Notwithstanding the vials of divine wrath have been poured out upon this ancient church of God; Christ has yet a true church on the earth, to perpetuate his name, and his praise, to the latest generation, into which at his second coming, this shepherd of Israel, will gather the remnant of his people, together with the fullness of the Gentiles, and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd throughout the habitable earth.

This little church from its infancy has been, like the ancient church in the wilderness, under great trials, and distresses, as well as frequent displays of his presence and protection. That Roman empire which blotted out the ancient church, and paved the way in the peaceful reign of Augustus Cesar for the planting of the christian church; in the course of three hundred and fifty years, raised ten general persecutions against her; persecutions designed to drown her in her own blood; yet Christ appeared in the midst of her afflictions, and massacres, and raised her to the dominion of bloody idolatrous Rome, under the patronage of Constantine the great, and through him she ruled the Roman empire.

In the midst of these triumphs, Constantine removed the seat of government from Rome to Byzantium, (a city of Greece) on the borders of the Black Sea, and changed its name to that of Constantinople, in honor of the emperor; this struck a fatal blow to imperial Rome; from this time the legs of iron, in this part of the great image of Nebuchadnezzar, began to decline, "the feet, part of iron, and part of clay" began to appear, and the empire began "to be partly strong, and partly broken."

When the Emperor Constantine removed the government to Constantinople, he left a viceroy in the west, styled the Exarch of Ravenna: (the name of the city where he resided) he, with the bishop of Rome, governed in the west. The pomp and splendor, which Constantine attached to the churches, and to the worship, greatly increased the power, and influence of the bishops, particularly the bishop of Rome; whose power soon became superior to that of the Exarch's of Ravenna.

The meekness, simplicity, and humility of the gospel, were soon succeeded, and swallowed up in this new order of things; which the luxury and effeminacy, of the Roman state, at this time, greatly favored. Under this state of things, and soon after the death of Constantine, the Goths and Vandals, under Alaric, began to make their depredations upon the western empire 410; and revenge upon those corrupt, effeminate Romans, the injuries they had suffered, from the depredations of their warlike ancestors.

These ravages continued about forty years; attended with all the excesses and cruelties of savage wars: until Attila, (styled the scourge of God) with his Huns, put an end to the western empire, by laying waste the countries, exterminating the inhabitants, pillaging and sacking Rome.

With the fall of the western empire, fell all the laws, religion, arts and sciences, of the west; and a state of perfect ignorance and barbarism, rose upon its ruins. This change introduced that period, known by the name of the dark ages; which continued about eight hundred years; down to the middle of the thirteenth century; and in some degree to this day.

The religion of these barbarians, was the grossest paganism. They respected neither age, sex, principle, or property, excepting that of the bishops of Rome : this the bishops soon took advantage of, and made up a religion, exactly suited to the spirit of the times : having the old Jewish religion for its basis,

The bishop of Rome laid aside his mitre, took the triple crown and sceptre ; and upon this Jewish basis introduced the worship of saints and images ; in imitation of the heathen mythology of the Greeks and Romans, and the Pagan religion of the barbarians. To these he added a corrupt christianity ; retaining little more of it, in its purity and power, than the name.

Armed with the authority of this religion, the bishop of Rome assumed independent sovereignty, and exercised the powers of a temporal prince ; the tyrant Phocas, who was then upon the throne of Constantinople, confirmed this power by a special edict, about the year 606. Under this edict were united, the spiritual and temporal powers of the bishops of Rome, and they claimed and exercised universal sovereignty.

About the year 746, the Franks, in addition to the Goths, Vandals, Allans, and Burgundi, who had overrun Gaul, came over the Rhine, and settled in the north, under Pharamond their leader. Clovis, their king, embraced the papal religion ; and Pepin, one of his successors, drew his sword, and marched an army into Italy, to protect the pope against his neighbors, when he began to make too free with his powers as universal bishop. The Pope, in his turn, to reward Pepin's fidelity, gave him his benediction ; and a general harmony has since prevailed between the two governments.

The bishop of Rome, or Pope, having thus obtained and exercised universal sovereignty : assumed to himself divine honors under the title of "our Lord God the pope ; the immaculate representative of God ; vicar of Jesus Christ ; and head of the church." Also, as proprietor of St. Peter, he held the keys of eternal justice, and became the grand arbiter of all spiritual concerns ; and the dispenser of pardon for all sins, past, present, and to come. The ceremony of address to his holiness was, to kiss his great toe ; with, or without the golden slipper, as his holiness might graciously condescend.

Thus seated on a temporal throne, with a dominion over the city of Rome, and the neighboring country, called the ecclesiastical states, which afford a small revenue ; the sale of indulgences gave a handsome addition to the crown ; and to increase it, his holiness created a middle state, after death, called purgatory, where all souls rested, that were not pardoned at death ; if they were not ransomed by their friends, with money, in a reasonable time, and prayed out, they passed into hell : but if thus saved, they went to heaven.

This system of finance gave his holiness a revenue, that enabled him to support a throne, with more magnificence and splendor, than any other potentate. See Daniel, 7th chapter, 7th and 8th verses, also 21—24, 25, 26.

CHAP. XI.

Kingdom of Charlemagne—of Mahomet—of the Turks—fall of the Roman empire at Constantinople.

WE have now traced the progress of this horn of the Roman beast, down to the year 800. At this time arose Charlemagne king of the Franks ; who subdued the several small states of France, Germany, and Italy, established the sovereignty and unity of the crown of France ; placed himself at the head of the German empire ; and received from the hands of Leo the 3d, the iron crown of the Romans, with the title of Emperor of the West.

Charlemagne, in his turn, protected the Pope ; enforced the papal religion, with fire and sword, throughout all his dominions ; and became one of the heads of the Roman beast, about 200 years after Pepin. This little horn, this papal beast, continued in regular progression, to enlarge and extend his power and influence, until the pontificate of Urban 2d, 1095, when the vision of the prophet was fully accomplished. “ And these”—i. e. the ten horns “ shall agree to give their power unto the beast.”

About 200 years after Charlemagne, Peter the Hermit came out of Germany over the Rhine, into the southern kingdoms, and preached the first crusade or holy war, against the infidels, who were then in possession of Jerusalem. The flame spread like lightning throughout Christendom. Princes sold or mortgaged their estates, to raise money ; rallied their subjects for the war, and took the field in person ; marched, or rather swarmed, into the plains of Asia Minor, and from thence into Syria, and laid siege to Jerusalem.

Here was exhibited such zeal and feats of valour, as were never before known. The city was carried by assault, and the christians held it one year. Before we proceed further with this war, we will take a view of the rise, progress and character of the powers against which all christendom had drawn the sword.

The prophecy upon Ishmael, when he was driven out from his father's house, has been thus far accomplished ; the storms of war have burst all around him, yet he has dwelt quietly in the presence of his brethren. We will now see how he put forth his hand upon the countries, rose into power, and " became a great nation."

About the year 606, Mahomet, a monk of Mecca, renounced his religion, in which he had been educated, retired to a cave, and framed a new one. As I have shewn, how the prophecy of the little horn was fulfilled in the papal power ; so I will shew, how the prophecy of St. John—Revelation ix. 1—11th, has been accomplished, in these locusts of Arabia.

When Mahomet had matured his religion, he came forth, and published it at Mecca ; asserting, that God had sent Christ, to publish his Religion, to persuade men to heaven, but that He had sent Mahomet to compel them to heaven ;—that he was the representative of God, and the only true prophet. He took for the basis of his religion, the old Jewish patriarchal ; with the indulgence of polygamy, and prohibiting the use of wine. In prayer, copying the Pharisees, but discarding the ritual or ceremonial law : denouncing Christ, and proclaiming himself the only true prophet.

Mahomet discarded the bible, and made one of his own, called the Koran, or Alcoran ; composed of a great number of detached sentences, enjoining polygamy, and prohibiting the use of wine : enjoining prayers, and here and there announcing " God is God, and Mahomet is his prophet !"

This religion being new, and more indulgent to the ambition, lusts and corruptions of men, he soon had followers. He also met with opposition. The city of Mecca banished the prophet, who fled to Medina, (another city of Arabia) which flight, called in Arabic the Hegira, is the date of the Mahometan era. Here his followers increased, till they soon made a strong military force. With this, he subdued his own country ; then carried his arms into Palestine, and took Jerusalem in 637.

He next overran Egypt, and took the city of Alexandria. The Caliph Omar ordered the largest library in the world, to be burnt ; with this reason, “ that if it contained any thing which was not in the Koran, it ought to be burnt, if not, it ought to be burnt.”

With the wealth and spoils of Egypt, another army was raised which went into the east ; overran and subdued the eastern provinces of the Roman empire, took Babylon, and razed it to its foundations ; and as the prophets, Jeremiah and Isaiah had predicted, “ swept her with the besom of destruction, so that her place is not to be found.”

The army of Egypt proceeded west at the same time, overran and subdued all the Roman provinces on the north of Africa, passed over into Spain, subdued that, and passed into France : here they were checked in a severe action, with Charles Martel, king of France ; and were driven back into Spain ; where they held possession, until they were driven out, with the assistance of the Moors, in 1091.

These locusts of the bottomless pit, continued their ravages upon the southern section of the Roman empire, five prophetic months, or one hundred and fifty years : they then built Bagdad, in the east, on the Tigris, and called it “ the city of peace.”

The conquests of the Ishmaelites, Mahometans or locusts, extended over all the north of Africa, Syria, Palestine, and the eastern provinces of the Roman empire, to the river Indus : and the religion of the prophet was enforced with the sword, throughout all this extent of dominion ; where it continued to prevail under the Saracens, until these provinces were wrested from them by the Turks.

When the vision of locusts was closed ; the prophet adds, “ one woe is past, behold ! there come two woes more hereafter ;” in the next verse goes on to unfold the vision of the Euphratean horsemen : and long before the use of gun-powder was known, he describes the exact explosion, as it appears when horsemen fire on horseback, “ fire, smoke and brimstone, coming out of the horses’ mouths.” These Tartars began their conquests with cavalry, and very numerous cavalry ; and the use of fire arms gave them a great superiority over their enemies, and rendered their conquests rapid and easy.

They overran and destroyed the Saracen empire, in the east, took Bagdad the capital, conquered Syria, and took Jerusalem. They also conquered Egypt, and all the Saracen states, on the north of Africa ; and having triumphed over the eastern and southern sections of the Roman empire, they entered Europe, and fixed their capital at Constantinople, in the year 1450. Thus the western Roman Empire, was placed under the dominion of the papal religion, and the eastern under that of Mahomet : where they will remain, until the accomplishment of the prediction of the apostle, 2 Thessalonians, ii. 3. “ Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or is worshipped ; sitting in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God : whom the Lord shall consume, with the breath of his mouth, and the brightness of his coming ; ” and until the vision contained in the 2d chapter of Daniel, and the latter part of the 7th shall be fulfilled.

Thus we have seen how a few military adventurers under Mahomet, grew into power, and overran mighty empires, states and kingdoms : also, how a small clan of Tartars near the source of the river Euphrates, began their depredations upon their neighbors, and being enriched and encouraged by their spoils, soon became numerous and powerful ; subdued the conquests the Saracens had made and enjoyed four hundred years ; adopted their religion, enforced it like Mahomet, with the sword, and the arm of the law ; fixed their capital in the seat of the beast with great iron teeth, and aspired to the dominion of the world.

Thus we have seen, the displays of the goodness of God, in the communications of himself, and his will to men, through the successive ages of the world, from the creation, to the flood ; a period of one thousand six hundred and fifty-six years : from the flood to the call of Abraham, and the founding of his church : from thence, through the medium of his prophets, God has unfolded all the great events which were to come to pass ; and the pens of the several historians have recorded their accomplishment, down to the destruction of the Roman empire, and the establishment of the beast and false prophet upon its ruins.

From the several chastenings of the ancient and modern church, (or Jewish and christian,) we may learn the truth of the great maxim of inspiration, that “ to whom much is given, of them much will be required ”—and “ he that knoweth his master’s will, and doeth it not, shall be be beaten with many stripes.”

PERSIA.

THE Medo-Persian empire, which was founded by Cyrus upon the union of the Babylonian, Medean, and Persian empires, about 536 years before Christ, passed through a succession of revolutions ; first by the conquest of the Greeks ; next by the conquest of the Romans ; then by the Saracens, or Arabians ; next by the Turks.

About the close of the 12th, or beginning of the 13th century, Jenghis Khan, a Tartar Prince, on the north of Persia, sprang up, assumed the style of conqueror, overran Persia, a great part of Hindostan, (or hither India,) extended his arms into the east as far as the confines of China, and laid the foundation of that extensive monarchy, known by the name of the Mogul's empire, or empire of the great Mogul. He was succeeded by Timer Bek or Tamerlane, (another Tartar prince,) who extended his conquests over all that part of Asia, which formerly composed the extensive empire of Persia, greatly weakened the growing strength of the Turks, and fixed the permanency of the Mogul's empire, 1399.

The dynasty continued in his line, almost three centuries and a half, until the conquest of Kouli Khan, 1732. This prince or sophi of Persia, threw off the Tartar yoke, and like Gustavus Vasa of Sweden, roused up his countrymen to assert their liberties : with this spirit, he broke the usurpation of the Tartars in Persia, and greatly weakened the empire of the Moguls. Since his conquest, the empire of Persia has been governed, like Egypt, by a number of independent sovereignties, and has been the theatre of distressing civil wars.

Kouli Khan, also penetrated into Hindostan 1735, dissolved the government of the Moguls, and left that country like Persia, under the government of a great number of independent sovereignties, styled Soubahs, or Nabobs. The civil wars between these Nabobs, laid the foundation for the extensive conquests and settlements of the English East India company in India, and guaranteed to them a revenue, which has enabled England to resist the ambition of the French revolution, furnish money for the support of all confederated Europe, through this arduous struggle of a twenty year's war, and by a splendid triumph give peace to the world.

We should here notice the display of the government of God, in raising up Charles XII. king of Sweden, to excite a spirit of enterprise in Russia. We now see in Persia, a character of the same description, in Kouli Khan ; raised up at the same time, and to co-operate in the same signal events, (although so remote from each other) by laying the foundation for those conquests in India, which have furnished the purse for confederated Europe, through the medium of England, and rendered their sword triumphant.

CHINA.

THIS empire, on the eastern extremity of the continent of Asia, differing from all others in its government, religion, manners, customs, and extensive population ; is noted for the pride of antiquity. The modern Chinese carry back their origin beyond the flood, and some of them beyond the creation. About two hundred years before Christ, literature began to flourish in China, the art of printing was discovered ; their first historian, Sematsian, wrote about ninety-seven years before Christ.

There is nothing that appears in their history with any certainty, farther back than the first dynasty under Prince Yao, or Yu, about two thousand years before Christ. From the nicest investigation of Chinese chronology, by some modern and learned Chinese, who were educated in France and returned to China in the year 1765, and whose correspondence has since been published at Paris ; it does not appear, that the kingdom was founded earlier than the year of the world 2207.

The Chinese suffered much from the depredations of the northern Tartars, until the reign of Chi-ho-angti, who caused the famous northern wall to be built, extending one thousand five hundred miles, from east to west. This secured the peace of China for several centuries ; but the Tartars, after repeated assaults, and depredations, finally succeeded in breaking over the wall, and subduing the empire in 1635, and a Tartar dynasty is now upon the throne. Under this dynasty, all the eastern part of the Mogul's empire has been added to China. The emperor resides in summer in Tartary, and in winter in China ; which preserves the union.

China Proper is supposed to contain more inhabitants than all Europe, they being estimated by Sir George Staunton at three hundred millions. The love of country is such in China, that they are never known to emigrate ; they carry on no foreign commerce, although their exports are immense. Foreigners are not admitted into any of their cities, and only into particular parts of their country near the sea coast, and into the suburbs of a few particular commercial cities.

Their government is absolute, and yet patriarchal ; the emperor is not the tyrant, but the father of his people. Their religion is pagan ; but so far mixed with the religion of Brama, that they have pure, and simple ideas of the supreme being, who presides over the universe : the doctrine of transmigration also, makes a part of the religion of China.

This country was first visited by the Portuguese, in their discoveries in the Indian ocean, in the year 1586 ; when they obtained a grant of the island of Macao, at the entrance of the harbor of Canton. Since that time, the commerce of China has been carried on from Europe and America, by the way of the Cape of Good Hope.

The pope sent missionaries, of the order of the Jesuits, into China, in the year 1692, who met with some apparent success, until they began to shew a disposition to dictate in the affairs of the government ; then the emperor expelled them in 1742. The English government attempted to establish a diplomatic intercourse with China in 1792, and sent lord Macartney for this special purpose ; but some manœuvres on the coast, particularly in approaching the shores with their ships, making soundings, &c. and imprudence in the mission soon defeated the object. The jealousy of the emperor was alive to these movements, and it is owing entirely to such jealousy, that China has so long retained her government.

United America, will doubtless in a few years enjoy a free trade with China, from the western shore of this continent, where will spring up and flourish, some of the largest and most splendid cities.

HINDOSTAN.

THIS Peninsula, known by the name of India within the Ganges, (or hither India) was discovered by the Portuguese, in 1497; and in the year 1506, they commenced the settlement of Goa, on the Malabar coast. Here they established an inquisition which continues to this day. It was visited over land by the English, 1591, and at the same time by a private adventure, of three ships. This adventure proved unfortunate; two of the ships were lost, and the third was seized on by the crew, and the captain, after an absence of three years, returned to England in another ship.

This adventure, though disastrous, laid the foundation for all the future prosperity of the English in India. The intelligence brought home by captain Lancaster, induced a second adventure, which proved successful, and laid the foundation of the charter for the first East India company, Dec. 1600, with a stock of 72,000*l.* In 1698, a new company was formed; and in 1700, the old one was re-established, for which they agreed to pay to government 400,000*l.* for five years. In 1773, the British government passed their India Bill, and in 1774 they sent out judges from England, to preside over their India settlements. The commerce of India continues to increase and flourish to this day.

The Dutch next explored the Indian ocean, and touched upon the peninsula of Hindostan in 1595. The English East India company made their first voyage in 1601. The same year the French doubled the cape of Good Hope, and visited India. In 1612, the Danes made their first voyage to India. All these kingdoms established India companies, after the manner of the English.

This country, when first visited by Europeans, was divided into a number of viceroyalties, or sovereignties, united under the emperor of Hindostan, or the Mogul's empire; possessing an extensive population, and enjoying one of the richest and most fertile soils, with a mild and delightful climate. The frequent wars which sprang up from time to time, between the princes or Soubahs, led them to have recourse to the Europeans for aid.

In 1738, the famous Kouli Khan, after having usurped the Persian throne, overran a great part of the Mogul's empire, weakened, and destroyed the power of the descendants of Tamerlane, a power which had continued nearly three centuries and a half; also overran Hindostan, dissolved the unity of the empire, and left it at the mercy of a great number of independent princes, who soon became rivals, and rendered this delightful country, a theatre of perpetual wars, and devastation.

This weakness of the natives, was soon turned to the advantage of the Europeans, and enabled them to maintain, and extend their settlements, the English, at Bombay, Madras, Calcutta, &c. ; and the French, at Pondicherry.

At the peace of 1763, the French ceded Pondicherry to the English, which gave them an unrivalled possession of the sea coast of this eastern world, secured the foundation of their extensive commerce, wealth and power : and enabled her to become mistress of the seas and arbiter of the world.

The population that has grown out of these settlements, with the extensive conquests which the British East India company have since made, amount to about twenty millions ; this, added to the settlements the English have made, and acquired, in the Indian ocean, (including New Holland, and the isles) is estimated at forty millions.

This extensive, rich, and populous country, has become the theatre of christian missionaries. The ancient religion of this country, was the religion of Brama, who taught the doctrine of one supreme being, who made, and governs all things, together with the absurd doctrine of metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls at death, into the forms of all the different animals, according to their characters in life ; and the practice of image worship, or idolatry.

Into what a state of corruption, ignorance, superstition, and enthusiasm, this religion is now fallen, has been very impressively disclosed by the Rev. Dr. Buchanan. Successful efforts are now making to translate the Bible into the different oriental languages, and diffuse it throughout this eastern world. A work slow in its progress, but one which will assuredly prosper and succeed.

TARTARY.

This vast extent of country, lying upon the north of Asia, and extending from the eastern borders of Russia in Europe, to the northern ocean on the north, and the Pacific ocean on the east, embracing Chinese Tartary, Thibet, and a part of Hindostan on the south ; was all known to the Greeks and Romans, under the general name of Scythia. The ancient Scythians defeated Alexander, by retiring before him, laying waste their country, and decoying him into their uncultivated wilds, where he had like to have been ruined and destroyed.

The same mode of warfare was practised by the Parthians, or Scythians, in the east, upon the Roman general Crassus, who was ruined with his army amidst the sands, and uncultivated plains of Parthia. By this mode of defence, they have been able to secure their country from conquest; but it has been no security against the feuds, civil wars, and massacres, which have constantly arisen out of their savage, barbarous manner of life, their divided, and wandering mode of subsisting, and the total want of union, and energy in their government. These civil wars, and massacres, have been common, and often attended with the slaughter of three or four hundred thousand. This has kept down their population, and wasted their strength; and has been the chief cause of their submission to the Russian government.

Some large and populous cities are scattered throughout this vast extent of country; but literature and the arts have never flourished in Tartary. The mass of the population lead wandering shepherd lives, or subsist by fishing, and hunting. The Tartars are noted for their attachment to the horse, and of course for their numerous and fine horses: they also prefer the flesh of this animal to that of the ox, or cow.

From these regions of barbarism, sprang up Othman, the conqueror of the west of Asia, and chief of the Turks; Jenghis Khan, and Tamerlane, the conquerors of the middle and southern parts of Asia; and from Chinese Tartary sprang the present reigning family on the throne of China. Since the conquests of Kouli Khan (the Persian,) early in the last century, there has been a general quiet throughout this eastern world.

The war practised by the Russians upon the emperor Napoleon in 1812, was a Tartar war; the same as was practised upon Alexander, the Grecian; upon Crassus, the Roman, and upon all other foreign invasions. The Russians decoyed him into their country, by retiring, and laying it waste; and when the emperor presumed that he had secured his object, in the possession of Moscow; the Tartar governor Rastopchin, set fire to the city, and burnt him out. This mode of defence has been invariably practised from the earliest ages, and with invariable success.

All this nest of ancient and modern conquerors, lying east of Russia in Europe, is now under a general system of government, and subject to the emperor of Russia; which will account for the general quiet that has so long prevailed in this country. Should the ambition of the present, or some future emperor, rouse up this now dormant force; the same scenes would be acted over again, and the same consequences result from them, as from the invasions of Othman, Jenghis Khan, Tamerlane, &c. The same countries which were then the theatres of conquest, are now as inviting, and as defenceless as they were then; and when under the direction of one government, so well organized, and so energetic as that of Russia, it may well be presumed that more serious, and extensive conquests may be effected, than any that have been recorded.

The southern nations are aware of this, and it is said that the Turks have a tradition, that the Russians will subdue their empire, and that they even fix upon a particular gate, at which they will enter when they shall subdue Constantinople.

Thus the southern kingdoms of Asia have been ravaged, and laid waste by the Tartars, or Scythians of Asia, from time to time, in the same manner as the southern kingdoms of Europe have been ravaged, and laid waste by the Celtii, Tartars, or Scythians of Europe. Even we, the favored inhabitants of America, sprang from the Saxons who were a clan, or tribe of Celtii, or Scythians, who subdued the Britons; planted in that isle the first principles of liberty, and pure representative government, and transplanted them into this new world, where they have flourished, and eclipsed the original stock.

EGYPT.

THIS kingdom was founded by Mizraim, the son of Ham, in the year before Christ, 2188. Possessing the richest soil, and the most inviting climate, it flourished above all other kingdoms, in wealth, splendor, literature, and the arts, and became the nursery from whence the splendid nations of Greece and Rome, derived their literature, and knowledge of the arts and sciences. Egypt became not only the pride of the world, but the envy of the world. It continued one thousand five hundred and eighty-eight years, when it was broken, and subdued by Nebuchadnezzar king of Assyria, about six hundred years before Christ.

During this period, were constructed those stupendous monuments of the arts, the pyramids; the largest of which covers with its base six acres of ground, and is six hundred feet in height; their splendid obelisks, and mummies, (those monuments of the art of embalming their dead,) the Egyptian cement, which hardened with time, and became more durable than stone; the canal that united the Nile with the Red Sea, and the almost innumerable canals that conducted the inundations of the Nile, and fertilized the whole face of the country; these were amongst the arts and improvements which distinguished Egypt.

Nebuchadnezzar, plundered and sacked the kingdom, broke its spirit, and rendered it an easy prey to the successive conquerors. Alexander the great conquered Egypt about the year 330 before Christ, and after his death it fell under the government of Ptolemy, one of his generals. It would have flourished under the Ptolemies, had it not been harrassed and distressed by the perpetual wars with the Selucidæ, or kings of Syria.

With the fall of the Grecian empire, Egypt fell under the dominion of the Romans, in the year 31 after Christ. It continued a Roman province until the conquest of the Saracens, about the year 625. They established the Mahometan religion, and governed Egypt by their caliphs, until the conquest of the Turks, in the year 1525.

The Turks confirmed the Mahometan religion in Egypt, and throughout their empire, and prostrated the strength of the kingdom, by giving it up to the government of a great number of petty sovereigns, called Beys, who wasted the energies, wealth, and resources of the country, and became tributary to the sultan of Constantinople. In 1799, this basest of kingdoms was overrun by the French, under general Bonaparte. In 1801 it was conquered by the English; and in 1803, ceded by the English back again to the Turks, under whose power it now continues. Thus we see how the prediction of the prophet, "Egypt shall become the basest of kingdoms," has been fulfilled.

Egypt, in its origin, was almost as ancient as Assyria, and Chaldea; and its duration as a kingdom, has clearly evinced the importance of those virtuous institutions, on which this monarchy was founded. At this early age of the world, the knowledge of the true God was lost, all men were sunk in a gross, and barbarous idolatry; the science of civil government was in its infancy, and the passions of men were corrupt. In this state of things, let us take a view of the principles which constituted the basis of their government, and see how far they became an example for the Greeks,—the Romans; and in point of moral virtue, have surpassed the governments of later ages; even of this boasted age of wisdom, light, experience, religion, and improvement.

The genius of their government was hereditary monarchy; to preserve the customs of their ancestors, was one of its fundamental maxims. The service of the king was considered too sacred, to be degraded by a foreigner; and the ear of majesty too pure to be polluted with ignoble sentiments.

The frugality of the king, and even the simplicity of his diet, were considered as objects of public importance, deserving the attention of the laws; public business of magnitude and importance, the prayers, devotions and sacrifices of the temple, together with a rehearsal of the exploits, and customs of his ancestors, from the sacred records, was prescribed to the king, as the duties of the morning. To enforce these, a certain pillar in the temple of Thebes, was inscribed with imprecations against that king who should dare to violate them.

To administer justice, preserve order, and support the throne, the king appointed thirty judges, selected from all the principal cities of Egypt. Wisdom and virtue, with a fair and good report, were the sole criterions of preferment; and the judges were supported at the expense of the king.

The laws governed in Egypt, and every citizen from his infancy was taught to know and reverence them. This established a regular system of habits, which enabled the Egyptians to preserve their government so long; and is the true maxim of the government of China to this day.

Ignorance and idleness were alike detested in Egypt; to suppress these, it became necessary for every man to enrol his name, together with his employment, upon a public register in the hands of some magistrate.

The Egyptians exempted from execution, or the power of the creditor, all the instruments used by the debtor to obtain his support ; judging it both barbarous and infamous, to divest a man of the means of subsistence, and of paying his debts, on account of his misfortunes ; but gave up the debtor in person to be imprisoned by the creditor.

The Egyptians paid the highest respect to old age ; the young always rose in their presence, and did them reverence.

Gratitude amongst the Egyptians was ranked with the first of the virtues, and gratitude to the king, claimed the first rank ; and upon this principle, that he who is grateful to men, will be grateful to the gods.

The religion of the Egyptians, was idolatry, wrapped in mysteries known only to the priests, and long since lost in the ages of obscurity, together with that labyrinth of hieroglyphics, which adorned the pyramids, obelisks, pillars, and statues of Egypt.

The superstition of the Egyptians, was as great as their deities were numerous, and it was death for any person to take the life of any one of all the numerous animals they worshipped.

The Egyptians, like all other idolaters, had this thin veil of covering for their religion, “ that they worshipped God in the image, and not the image as God.”

The pyramids of Egypt, those mausoleums of the dead— together with their mummies, those monuments of the art of embalming their dead, clearly shew the reverence the Egyptians paid to their funerals, and the sacred rites of sepulture. By embalming they preserved entire the persons of their ancestors adorned with such hieroglyphics as were commemorative of their virtues,—and those only which were sanctioned by the public voice.

The hieroglyphical panegyrics upon the dead, regarded not birth, wealth, or honors ; all Egyptians were considered noble. The virtues of the dead, were alone the subjects of praise. The military character of Egypt, with all her boasted regularity of force and discipline, was never illustrious, excepting in the wars of Syria, and in the reign of Sesostris.

Egypt early became the nursery of the arts and sciences ; in these she excelled, and left it to all nations who have succeeded her, to become only her imitators, and not even that, in her pyramids, hieroglyphics, the art of embalming, and her wonderful cement. Geometry was greatly improved in Egypt, by which means the study of astronomy, which commenced upon the plains of Babylon, was carried to great perfection.

The medical art was rendered illustrious in Egypt, where it was reduced to a regular system, and every physician was by law confined to one disease only. If he treated this according to the prescribed rules, he was not held responsible for the issue; but if he made any new experiments, his own life was held responsible for the issue.

The splendid libraries which were early founded in Egypt, shew their taste, and improvement in the sciences; and the sacred dedication of these libraries, "Office for the diseases of the Soul," shews the reverence they attached to learning and their abhorrence of ignorance.

The Egyptians excelled in architecture, painting and sculpture; but music never struck their attention; they considered this as a useless art of effeminacy, and beneath their notice.

Agriculture was the basis on which Egypt founded her greatness, it being the source of all her wealth. All employments were alike respected in Egypt, from the king to the peasant; and he who excelled in his profession, and in virtue, inherited the triumph of public applause. This diffused contentment, excited emulation, and raised every employment to its highest perfection.

The country of Egypt was greatly enriched by their husbandmen, who covered the whole face of this garden of the world, with their numerous flocks and herds. These constituted the permanent wealth of their country.

The soil that so richly rewarded the husbandmen, was not watered by rains as with us, but by the overflowing of the river Nile; these inundations were conveyed by numerous canals over the whole face of the country, to fertilize the soil, which has rendered Egypt so famous for her corn, and give support to those vast flocks and herds, which covered all her plains.

The vegetation of Egypt was not peculiar to that country, excepting the papyrus, or plant which served them for paper: the rest was common to countries of the same climate, and continues so to this day.

The government of Egypt supported a regular system of police, every department in the kingdom was conducted with the greatest order, regularity and wisdom; and the voice of health and plenty were heard in all their dwellings.

The military art was never highly cultivated in Egypt; Sesostri alone, carried his arms abroad beyond the plains of Syria. He subdued all the north of Africa, carried his arms into India, about 1500 years before Christ, and left monuments of his conquests in Asia Minor and Thrace. His dominions extended from the Ganges to the Danube. Sesostriſ, at the end of nine years, returned into Egypt, enriched with the wealth and spoils of conquest; but left thoſe nominal conquests as free as he found them. Sesostriſ flouriſhed about the time of the departure of the Hebrews.

Theſe conquests of Sesostriſ opened the way for thoſe colonies which paſſed into Greece at this time under Cecrops, Danaus and Cadmus, who carried with them the arts and ſciences of Egypt, and planted the firſt ſeeds of improvement and literature in Europe.

The conquests of Sesostriſ, ſubverted the religion, habits, manners and cuſtoms of Egypt; together with that temperance, induſtry, ſobriety and economy, which were the pillars of Egyptian greatneſs; laid the foundation for all the future ſufferings of Egypt, and brought her to fulfil the predictions of the prophet—"Egypt ſhall become the baſeſt of kingdoms."

Soon after the death of Sesostriſ, commenced the reigns of Cheops and Cephrenus, who cauſed all the temples of religion to be closed, nearly one whole century; built ſome of the pyramids, proſtrated religion and all the virtues; and gave themſelves up to all the exceſſes of licentiousneſs, cruelty and barbarity. The whole nation followed their example; and Egypt, this nurſery of the arts, this ſchool of virtue and morals, this paragon of induſtry, temperance and ſobriety, was now become a ſink of iniquity, and every hateful luſt.

Such is the fate of all nations, as ſoon as they loſe their virtue; and the hiſtory of Egypt, as connected with the hiſtory of the Jews, together with the hiſtory of the four great empires, clearly ſhews that ſhe never recovered her virtue, religion, ſtrength nor character; all wiſneſs againſt her, that ſhe became the baſeſt of kingdoms, even to this day.

DENMARK.

THIS kingdom was firſt eſta bliſhed by Gormo, in the year 714. The moſt diſtinguiſhed part of the hiſtory of this kingdom, conſiſts in its invaſions and depredations upon the iſland of England. In the year 877, the Danes ſucceeded in the conqueſt of the Saxons, and eſta bliſhed Canute upon the throne.

In 880 they were expelled by Alfred the great. In the year 995 the Danes extorted a tribute from the Britons of 16,000*l.* to buy off their depredations. In 1002 the Danes broke the treaty, and by their renewed depredations, extorted from Ethelred II. a tribute of 24,000*l.* In the year 1412 Norway was united to Denmark. In the year 1521 the kingdom of Denmark was separated from the kingdom of Norway, and in 1660 the crown of Denmark became hereditary.

In the year 1394 the kingdom of Sweden was united by conquest to the crown of Denmark, and was subject to her until the year 1525, when Sweden recovered her liberty, under the illustrious Gustavus Vasa ; since which time, Denmark has held a secondary rank amongst the nations of the north. In 1813 the Kingdom of Norway was severed from Denmark, and given to the crown prince of Sweden, by the confederated powers of Europe, where it now remains.

The local situation of Denmark, gave her high and commanding advantages, to become one of the first commercial and maritime nations of the world ; had not the jealousy and rival strength of England kept her down. In the year 1536 the protestant religion was introduced into Denmark, and in 1629 Christian the IV. was chosen head of the protestant league against the house of Austria.

It has been the policy of the late sovereigns of Denmark, to cultivate a good understanding with the throne of England by intermarriages, and the issue of such an alliance, now governs the kingdom of Denmark. Denmark still holds some possessions in the Indian ocean, and upon the western shore of Africa ; she exercises a sovereignty over east and west Greenland, and a part of Lapland ; and holds some small possessions in the West-Indies. Denmark can never rise to eminence, being situated between the gigantic powers of England and Russia.

Such are the great outlines of all the kingdoms, states, and empires, which have ever been distinguished, either for their arts or their arms. To give a sketch of the minor states and isles, would swell this work to a needless expense.

(A.) GREECE.

To record a faithful narrative of events is one duty of a historian ; but to diffuse by his pen, the true spirit of the various scenes, events, exploits, and achievements which he relates, is by far the most difficult and important part of his duty ; and is as absolutely necessary, to give spirit, interest, energy and instruction to his narrative, as for a musician, in his performance, to give expression to the piece he performs.

To effect this, he must assume the spirit of every scene, and every character, which become the subject of his story. Hence the reason why the history of Greece so far surpasses all others ; because those who were the heroes of her most splendid scenes, diffused the same fire, and the same spirit, throughout the historic page of their country, and taught posterity to feel, what they had achieved. To preserve this fire, is ever essential to the preservation of the history of Greece.

Greece, which was situated in the south part of what is now Turkey in Europe, we have already noticed, with regard to its origin, and extreme ignorance, in its early ages. The splendor of Greece in later ages, which gave such lustre to the historic page, claims attention. The first settlement in Greece commenced about 2000 years before Christ, and about 200 years after the building of Babylon by Ninrod.

Letters were introduced into Greece by Cecrops, Cadmus, and the Egyptian colonies, in the reign of Sesostris, king of Egypt—about 1500 years before Christ. This first period of Grecian history, is only a picture of man in his most rude and savage state. The progress of letters, the arts and refinement under the Egyptian colonies, were much slower than in Britain, after the conquest of Julius Cesar. The Egyptian colonies could only teach, they had not, like the Romans, the power to enforce their knowledge.

The limits of this work will not permit a separate detail of the founding, and progressive improvements of the several Grecian colonies, kingdoms, or states ; they must all be comprised under one general view. The first particular in Grecian history worthy of notice, is the expedition of the Argonauts to Colchos, after the golden fleece ; about 1200 years before Christ. The fleece, which was the object of this voyage, may well be called golden, by a people who were like the ancient Britons, either naked, or clad in the skins of animals, taken in the chase. This took place about 300 years after Cecrops and Cadmus settled in Greece ; and had this importance attached to it ; that it laid the foundation of Grecian commerce and navigation, which afterwards became so conspicuous.

The next important period in Grecian history, is the siege of Troy, about 900 years before Christ, and about 300 from the expedition of the Argonauts. This period of the last 300 years, shews the rapid improvements the Greeks had made in letters, arts, and arms, by the strength of the city of Troy ; by the splendid display of arms during this ever memorable siege, of ten years ; and more particularly in the unparalleled narrative of the Trojan war, by Homer, the father of epic poetry. All these combined, serve to shew the power of letters, and of commerce, to expand the mind, elevate the soul, and exalt the character of man to the summit of his rational powers,

The narrative of Homer diffused a spirit of ambition and emulation throughout the states of Greece ; which established the games of Olympia, about 200 years after the Trojan war, and about 700 before Christ. It must not be understood that these games originated in Greece at that time, they were in general composed of such athletic exercises, as have ever been common to all new countries ; but they were reduced to system and order, under that institution, and greatly enlarged and improved.

The exercises of these games consisted in chariot races, foot races, &c. together with all such athletic exercises as were calculated to exert muscular strength and dexterity ; inspire courage and emulation. So highly were the prizes of the Olympic games estimated, that even kings entered the lists, and sought with avidity the glory of an Olympic crown.

From the commencement of the Olympic games, to the Peloponnesian war, (which rendered Greece one theatre of carnage, about twenty-five years,) about 450 years before Christ ; a period of Grecian history was exhibited, the most splendid of any other of her greatness. In this age flourished her greatest orators, heroes, statesmen, legislators, philosophers, and artists.

In this period, Darius, king of Persia, after he had waged unsuccessful war against the ancient Daci, (or Scythians of Europe, north of the Danube,) turned his arms against Greece, and threatened Athens, with an army of 300,000 men under Datis. At this eventful period, flourished Aristides, Pericles, Themistocles, and Miltiades, who saved Greece by the overthrow of the Persians at the famous battle of Marathon, destroyed their army, and gave peace to their country.

At the commencement of this period, flourished Lycurgus, the renowned legislator of Sparta,* and at the close of it, flourished Solon, the famous legislator of Athens; † the wisdom of whose institutions, (though very different,) will ever remain memorable in the annals of Greece. During this period, and soon after the invasion of Darius, commenced the invasion of Xerxes, which has been noticed.

* Lycurgus, the renowned legislator of Sparta, travelled into Egypt, Palestine, and the countries of the east; selected all that was useful, and virtuous, from their governments; from which he formed a system of government for his country, perfectly simple, and practical. This government was founded upon the purest principles of liberty, industry, temperance, patience, virtue, justice, and valour. It taught the most sovereign contempt of riches, idleness, luxury, effeminacy, cowardice and sloth; alike disclaimed the principles of ambition, and conquest; was sanctioned by the oracle of Delphos—rendered permanent by an oath of his country, to maintain the Constitution in his absence, until he should return; sealed by his voluntary banishment and death; continued in successful operation about 500 years; enabled Sparta to triumph over Athens in the Peloponnesian war, and become the arbiter of Greece.

The great maxim of the government of Lycurgus was, to perpetuate the laws, manners, customs, and habits of his country, without innovation, or change; and to enforce this maxim, he sacrificed his life. The immortal Lycurgus did all this, by a system of instruction which was incorporated into his government. All Sparta was one great school; and the maxims of his government, were the fundamental principles of education. Practical knowledge, formed the wisdom of Sparta.

† The difference of character between the Athenians and Spartans, was such as is common to states which are agricultural and commercial. Sparta was agricultural, Athens commercial; the seat of the muses and the arts. Solon as the chief magistrate, or Archon of Athens, attempted to reform her government, and reduce it to a more regular and practical system.

He divided Athens into two great classes, the rich and the poor.—The rich he again divided into three classes, according to their degrees of wealth; all those of five hundred measures, (annual income,) composed the first class; those of three hundred the second; and those of two, the third; these made up the classes of the rich, and to these he confined all the public offices.

All those whose incomes were less than two hundred, composed the class of the poor. These were debarred from office; but as a compensation, he left them the privilege of voting in the assemblies, and

The conflicts occasioned by the revolutions in the several states, in their struggles for power, between the tyrants, and the people ; between monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy, were often distressing and bloody. This people with all their boasted wisdom, knew nothing of that balance of elective government, which is the basis of English, and American liberty. The conflicts between the rival states for supremacy, (notwithstanding the Amphictyonic council, the Achean league, and other confederacies,) were often severe and desperate : but the Peloponesian war, which commenced between the two great rival states, Lacedemon and Athens, involved all Greece in one great struggle, which raged twenty-five years, with all the violence of Grecian conflict ; closed with the humiliation of Athens, destroyed their balance of power, and established the supremacy of Sparta in Greece.

From this time, Greece began to decline, became a theatre of weakness, intrigue, and disorder, amidst all the splenjudgments of the people. An appeal was open from the judgments of the magistrates to the people, which finally placed the balance of power in the hands of the poor, when they became the most numerous ; and they by their decisions gave law to the state.

These principles formed the great outlines of the government of Solon, and partook much less of the balance of power, so essential to good government, than the system of Lycurgus. Solon restored and improved the Areopagus, or high court of the nation, introduced many wise laws, and regulations, which were calculated to suppress indolence, and vice ; and encourage industry, virtue and good order.

He then, after the manner of Lycurgus, obtained an oath from his country, to observe his laws one hundred years ; and went abroad on his travels. At the end of ten years he returned, and found the Athenian state torn with factions and civil wars, which his government had no power to control, and the personal efforts of Solon, no power to regulate, or even check.

Pisistratus, one of the competitors for power, amidst the factions of his country, assumed the mask of meekness, and great humility, became the man of the people, robbed them of their liberties, and became the tyrant of Athens. Solon lived to see Pisistratus twice deposed by the factions of his country, and died of old age ; leaving Athens under the dominion of the tyrant.

This usurpation in Athens, caused the wars which followed between Greece and Persia, and rendered Greece a theatre of carnage, and distress, for so many years, under the invasions of Darius and Xerxes. The expulsion of the two great Persian invasions, shewed to Greece, what valour could achieve ; and the union of Greece, under the government of Alexander, shewed to the world, the strength and energies of a permanent government.

dor of her boasted refinement, and wisdom, under Socrates, Plato and Aristotle, and all the eloquence of Demosthenes, until she fell a prey to the intrigues of Philip king of Macedonia, and the arms of his son Alexander ; about 300 years before Christ. The conquests of Alexander produced the same effects upon Greece, as the conquests of Sesostris had done upon Egypt. With this blow, her virtues were lost forever ; the arts and sciences continued to sink with her liberty, until the overthrow of the city of Corinth, by the Roman consul Mummius.—This destroyed the Achean league. Greece was then blotted out of the list of nations, and became a Roman province ; about 150 years before Christ.

The trophies of Greece graced the triumphs of Rome, under her successive consuls. Greece became the theatre of Roman war, until Rome triumphed over all the neighbouring powers, and carried her arms into the east.—Greece was a province until the year of our Lord 330, when the emperor Constantine transferred the seat of government from Rome to Byzantium, called it Constantinople, after his own name, and under the power and splendor of the Roman capital, the splendor of learning, and the arts, again flourished where Greece lay in ruins.

The arm of despotism sat triumphant in the midst of that country, where liberty, valour, patriotism, economy, industry, and faugality, with their attending virtues ; where wisdom, philosophy, science and the arts; once shone with such perfect splendor, as rendered Greece the pride and admiration of the world.

Her heroes slept in death, and witnessed not the distressing scene. Her legislators, philosophers, poets, orators, and artists were all hushed in repose, and witnessed not the ruins of their degraded country ; that country they had enriched and rendered so illustrious, by their wisdom, virtue, enterprise and arms. But their illustrious deeds are recorded in the temple of immortal fame, and their names can never die.

Rome held the dominion of Greece from the conquest of the consul Mummius, to the conquest of the Turks, in the year of our Lord 1450, about 1600 years, and with the fall of her Grecian power at Constantinople, fell the last vestige of the gigantic power of Rome. All that remained of Greece or Rome, is now lost in the dominion of the Turk. Virtue is the glory of man ; but luxury, vice, and corruption, ever have been, and ever will be, the ruin of nations.

(B.) ROME.

Before Christ.

This renowned city and empire, were founded, as we have noticed, by Romulus, one of the descendants of Æneas, who fled from the ruins of Troy, and settled in Italy. The period which passed between the destruction of Troy, and the founding of Rome; together with the advantages which they derived from the improvements of their country, in arts, and in arms, must have given the Roman colony such early advantages over the rude natives of Italy, as to have enabled them to have acquired at that time, not only a respectable possession, but a superiority of character, and respectability. To perpetuate these advantages, Romulus, the then head of the colony, founded the city of Rome in the 394th year after the destruction of Troy, and before Christ, 753.

For the good government of his city, he instituted a senate or council of ancients, composed of 100 citizens, noted for their wisdom and virtue. By the wisdom of this senate, he was enabled to support the title and dignity of king, and thus laid the foundation of the greatness of Rome. Romulus made it the first object of his care, to people his city ; and to this end, he invited and encouraged strangers to settle in it. This, like the settlement of all new countries, increased the male population faster than the female. To obviate this, he exhibited the Grecian games in his little city, and gave a general entertainment to his neighbors ; in the midst of these scenes, the Romans seized on the Sabine women, and took them to wife, in the year before Christ, 750.

This perfidious act, involved the Romans in a war, which raged through the life of Romulus, who reigned thirty-seven years, died, and was deified. The government devolved upon the senate for one year, when they elected Numa Pompilius their king, who reigned in wisdom forty-three years, and made great improvements. He was succeeded by Tullius Hortilius. In this reign was the famous combat for supremacy, between the three Roman chiefs, the Horatii, and the three Alban chiefs, the Curatii. The Romans were victorious, and the Alban state was annexed to Rome, 667

ion of the Roman city were enlarged, until the wicked reign of Tarquin the proud, their seventh and last king. He by his unhallowed abuse of Lucretia, the wife of Collatinus, one of the nobles of Rome, overthrew the government. The virtuous citizens, fired with indignation at this flagrant outrage, flew to arms, deposed the king, banished him and his family, destroyed the kingly government, and elected two consuls for one year, with equal powers, as a check upon each other. These with the senate, which had been increased to the number of two hundred, now became the government of Rome. 500.

During this period, and under the reign of the former Tarquin, the walls of Rome were laid, the circus was built, which would contain 150,000 spectators, the capitol was founded, and the great outlines of many great improvements were begun. The Romans soon experienced a weakness in their government, which arose out of the divided head, and attempted to remedy this, by creating the office of dictator, (a kind of Emperor,) with supreme power. 493.

This supreme power, added to the consuls and senate, soon became oppressive to the people, and they assumed the reins of government, and created the office of tribunes of the common people, as a check upon the aristocracy of the three other powers. 486.

Quintus Cincinnatus was taken from his plough, and made dictator. 450.

Cincinnatus then owned but four jugera of land, about two acres of our measures; this serves to show that merit, not wealth, governed Rome at this age, and that the people were rather jealous of the rich; but all this did not satisfy them; they made a new change in their government, chose ten wise men, called Decemvirs, and abolished the office of consul. 450.

The Decemvirs formed a code of laws, called the ten tables, and caused them to be inscribed upon pillars of brass. They became the standard of the judicial proceedings of Rome. In the second year of the Decemvirs, one of their body was guilty of lewdness; the virtue of the people resented the outrage, revenged the indignity, and abolished the office, together with that of tribunes; and the dictators and senate, governed Rome about seven years. Their restless spirit again became factious, and they created the office of censor. 443.

The object of this office, was to be a check upon the dictator and senate ; this soon failed, and they chose military tribunes as a substitute for the old office of consuls. This continued two years, and was then abolished and the office of consuls restored.

During these changes in the government, Rome was harassed by perpetual wars, with the Gauls, and various other neighboring nations, particularly the Samnites, who were the most powerful and warlike of all the tribes in Italy. These nations often distressed the Roman state, and carried their victorious arms to the gates of Rome.

The wars of Rome had hitherto been carried on for the defence of the state, or military glory, by voluntary service ; they first began to pay their troops about the year 400.

The office of consul did not abridge the powers of the senate ; they were as independent of each other, as in the times of the kings ; and the consuls were kings at the will of the people ; the consuls led the armies, and the senate governed the state ; but the comitia or general assemblies of the people, held all the power in their own hands, both of peace and war, and through their tribunes, they held the two great springs of government in their hands—rewards and punishments. They held at their disposal all the offices of state, and all were amenable to the people for their conduct. The consuls were the executive, the senate the legislative, and the people the electors and arbiters of the whole. Here was energy, wisdom and folly, all so commixed, as to create perpetual jealousy, discord and collision between the government and the people, and occasion those frequent changes, which the true balance of the federal constitution of America so wisely regulates and controls.

Poverty was not only respected at Rome, as may be seen in the appointment of Cincinnatus the dictator ; but it made a part of their policy, in using heavy money of brass, in imitation of the Spartan iron money ; which continued to be the money of Rome, until they carried their arms into Sicily, in the first Punic war ; they then found it necessary to coin silver money. 261.

The virtue and simplicity of manners in the Roman state, were the palladium of the liberty of Rome. The censors were the immediate guardians of this palladium ; this office was generally filled by those whose virtues had held the first dignities of the state, with the highest approbation ; this office protected virtue and suppressed vice and immorality, even in the highest walks of life, with a severity that preserved the Roman virtue pure.

The prætors composed the judiciary of the state ; the ediles were more immediately the magistrates of the city ; the two offices became of high importance, and in after times the medium of ambition and power. The struggles between the government and the people, shewed the want of a middle state, to regulate these feuds.

The equestrian order held this rank in some measure, not by any delegated powers, but by the influence which their wealth, dignity and importance gave them in the community ; and when united with the patricians, they checked and controlled the licentiousness of the populace. Thus a partial substitute for the true balance in the government, grew out of the necessity of things, and the virtue of the state, formed the grand cement to the whole ; these combined with a high military spirit and ardor, together with the greatness and nobleness of the Roman soul, raised the Roman state from a single point, amidst perpetual struggles in arms, to become the mistress of the world.

Amidst all the guardians of Roman greatness and Roman virtue, stood woman ; she by her smiles, or her frowns, moved the arbiter of manners, of morals, and of virtue ; by the dignity and majesty of her character, commanded the admiration and respect of all classes and ranks of citizens ; and by the splendor of her virtues, gave a lustre to the Roman name. Nothing in Rome, was held more sacred than the majesty of woman. Such was the character of the Roman matrons, that it stands recorded to their eternal honor, that not one single divorce stained the marriage covenants of Rome for more than five hundred years after the days of Romulus.

Rome in her infancy, thus having laid the foundation of her greatness, was soon visited by the philosophers of Greece, Pythagoras and others, who introduced the Grecian Mythology, which deified all the virtues, gave them the first rank in their temples, and thus perpetuated their value by their religious adoration.

The religious homage paid to the virtues, perpetuated the purity of the state, as their splendid triumphs perpetuated the lustre of their arms. Trained in this school of temperance, and the virtues, the Roman armies, from the consul to the soldier, carried to the field a Roman soul warmed with Roman greatness and valor, and never once dreamed that they could sheath the sword, until they had executed the decrees of the senate.

Rome began the second war with Carthage, B. C. 218.

And the third Punic war, 149.

Carthage was destroyed by Scipio the Roman consul, 146.

Marius the consul obtained the Roman triumph, with the conquest and spoils of Numidia, and her captive prince, 103.

These were the days of virtue—these were the days in which Rome, under the consular arms, subdued all Europe, south of the Danube, from the Atlantic on the west, to the Hellespont on the east. These were the days in which Pompey the great rescued his country from the civil wars of Marius and Sylla, carried his arms into Asia, and after long and distressing conquests, dedicated to his triumphant country, the whole extent of the states and kingdoms, between the Black Sea on the north, and the Red Sea on the south, brought Mithridates and Tigranes, the greatest monarchs of Asia, to submit to the Roman arms, and settled the dominion of the East. At the head of his victorious legions, he did homage to the laws of his country, resigned his authority and again became a private citizen, about the year 60.

The subversion of Roman liberty under Cesar, we have noticed, also the glorious reign of Augustus, the first emperor; the fatal effects of the division of the empire, by Constantine, and the final overthrow that followed the loss of Roman virtue, and the corruption of Roman manners.

So long as the Roman virtues and simplicity of manners remained, so long Roman wisdom and the public good, supplied the place of a balance of power in the government; the folly of the populace, was controlled by the wisdom and virtue of the senate, and the energies of the consuls, supported the glory of the state. When Carthage had fallen, and with her all fears of a rival; when the wealth and luxury of Asia, with the refinements of Greece, flowed into Rome, and corrupted her manners and morals, by changing public respect for virtuous poverty, into the admiration of licentious wealth; then money supplanted all the virtues, bribery and corruption followed, the folly of the populace overpowered the wisdom of the senate, the consular energies were turned against the liberties of Rome, Cesar triumphed over Pompey, and this mighty government, which had given law to the world, fell under the rod of a despot.

Rome in the midst of her corruption could boast of her Catulus, Lentulus, Cotta; her Hortensius, Calvus and Cicero; her Metellus, and Lucullus; her Pompey and Cato; but her virtue was gone, her morals were gone, and above all, the majesty of woman was gone; the smiles or the frowns of this key of virtue, no longer rewarded the pure and controlled the corrupt. With the fall of woman, fell the manners of Rome; and elegance, purity and refinement, were swallowed up in luxury, effeminacy, dissipation and corruption. Wisdom, eloquence, manners and morals, with the Roman virtues, and Roman liberty, all fell a prey to all conquering luxury, and corrupt ambition, in regular succession, until they were swallowed up, with Rome herself, in the deluge of northern barbarism.

SKETCHES OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

FROM THE REVOLUTION OF THE WESTERN ROMAN EMPIRE 410, TO THE YEAR 1818 OF THE CHRISTIAN ERA.

CHAP. I.

Revolution of the Western Roman Empire—character of the Barbarians—laws of division and tenure of their spoil—character of the Roman Religion—Religion of the Barbarians—character of the dark ages—origin of the feudal system.

THE luxuries of the Roman empire, which followed their conquests in the east, with all their train of effeminacy and corruption, swept away that Roman valor, which had shone so conspicuous in the days of Fabius, Scipio and Cesar, and opened the way for the subversion of the western empire, in about one century after Constantine, the emperor, removed the government to Byzantium, or Constantinople.

The northern barbarians, who inhabited the regions of Germany, Poland, Denmark, Sweden and Norway; (all then one vast uncultivated forest, thinly peopled with a race of men in a state of nature, much like the Aborigines of North America,) lived wandering lives, without letters and the arts. The people who inhabited Germany, had been harassed by the Romans, in their conquests under Julius Cæsar, and treated with that severity the Romans were accustomed to bestow upon such barbarians as they were resolved to tame to their submission.

These barbarians took advantage of this weak and divided state of the Roman empire, to revenge the wrongs which they had suffered from Roman invasions, and began their depredations in the year 410, under Alaric.

One success encouraged and invited another, as wave follows wave, until the whole northern wilderness was in motion, and the various tribes of Goths, Vandals, Visigoths, Alans, Suevi, &c. rushed like a torrent down upon the Romans, spreading carnage, desolation and destruction, through the finest provinces.

This torrent raged, until Attila with his Huns, from the shores of the Euxine sea, sacked Rome, overwhelmed Italy, and destroyed every vestige of the Roman government in the west, together with the arts and sciences, manners and customs of the Romans ; exterminated the Roman population, and planted their barbarous hordes upon its ruins.

At the first of the sixth century, the Goths and Franks were possessed of Gaul ; the Ostrogoths and Huns of Italy and Pannonia ; the Visigoths of Spain, and the Saxons of Britain. New laws, languages, manners, customs, dresses and even names of men, things and countries, produced a total change in the western Roman empire.

The object of this part of our work, is to shew the evils that resulted from this change ; and the ultimate good which has resulted from those evils ; and to unfold the wisdom of the divine plan in subverting the despotic idolatry and corruption of the Roman state, to open the way for the religion of the gospel, and the triumph of the “ kingdom of the stone, which should be cut out of the mountain without hands, become a great mountain and fill the whole earth.” Daniel ii. 35, 36.

Terrible as was this revolution in its ravages, effects and consequences ; it has long been well understood, that the good of the world required the subversion of the corrupt, bloody, despotic and idolatrous government of Rome, although nothing, but a special miracle of God, short of this northern exterminating revolution, could have effected the change.

The barbarians treated with derision and contempt every mark of Roman splendor, elegance and grandeur, as the debasing causes which rendered the Romans so easy a conquest, and planted their own barbarous customs upon their ruins, as the great instruments of promoting that valour, which had been the immediate cause of all their triumphs.

To enforce this contempt upon the rising generation, they erected a cottage upon the ruins of a palace, and caused the vanquished to be fed with elegance, while they partook of their rustic fare, in their rustic form, seated upon the ground. The religion of the two great parties was idolatry ; but differing according to their difference of refinement.

Jupiter, the god of the Romans, presided over the universe, held the balances of events, and ruled the destinies of men ; by the thunderbolts of heaven enforced obedience to his laws, and took vengeance on his enemies. Mars, one of the lesser deities, wielded the sword ; rewarded with victory the arm of the valiant, and humbled the refractory, avaricious, licentious and effeminate, as trophies of the victors ; whilst Apollo, the god of wisdom, directed the councils of the virtuous and wise.

These, with a host of others, were the gods of the Romans, but Woden, the god of the barbarians, was a god of vengeance, who sanctioned all that exterminating malice, which blotted out the Roman name in the west ; presided over the judicial combats and civil wars, which drenched Europe in blood, through the dark ages, of nearly 1000 years ; until ferocity itself was glutted with carnage ; and the sons of these sires, under the benign influence of the gospel, received a polish from the revival of letters ; and savage man, was again enrobed in humanity from the improvement of those arts, which their fathers had rendered the victims of their vengeance, and sacrificed to Woden their god.

Although popery arose out of this tempestuous sea of ignorance and barbarity ; yet popery with all its corruptions, was better than the mythology of idolatrous Rome ; it laid the foundation for the display of the angel of the gospel in the reformation, under the immortal Luther, and opened the way for the kingdom of the stone, which shall fill the whole earth, through the millennial period, and consummate to man all the blessings of the future promises.

The genius of the government of these barbarians, was liberty and equality ; he who was most alert in the chase, most hardy in toils, and most valiant in war, became their chief ; and this was common to all the clans. Their division of conquest and plunder was by lot, according to their different shares, from the chief to the soldier ; and the tenure of their property was a tenure of force.

One example may serve to illustrate this fact. " When the Franks, had taken a large silver vase from a certain church, a petition was sent to Clovis, their chief, that he would restore that silver vessel to its sacred use. When they were about to divide the spoil, Clovis requested that that vase might be given to him separately, before the division ; to which all consented, but one soldier, who struck the vase with his war club, and exclaimed, "there shall be no division here but by lot;" and it was conclusive.

In this state of things, property became a curse instead of a blessing; the weak with their shares fell a sacrifice to the strong; this led the common people to the chiefs for justice and protection, who in their turn seized on their estates, when it suited their humor, or interest; others, to avoid these distresses, yielded up their shares to the chiefs for protection, and became their vassals. Thus from the necessity of things, the chiefs obtained what they could not protect, for the want of legal and coercive power, to restrain such a state of weakness, licentiousness and anarchy.

The same acts of violence and oppression, which destroyed the liberties, persons and properties of the common people, were common among the chiefs; these made war and committed depredations upon each other, as suited their lusts, ambition or resentments; this led them to the king for redress; his decisions, and the common safety, administered a partial remedy for a time; but the chiefs exercised the most despotic sway over their subjects; they were considered and held, as the property of the chiefs upon their estates; were bought and sold like cattle, either separately or collectively, with estates, and even matrimony and their children were at the disposal of the lords. This gave rise to, and supported the system of government, called the feudal system.

This was the military system which subjected the property of the chief with all their vassals, to the controul of the king, for the defence of the nation, and the public weal.—This system became common to all these clans or kingdoms; was the source of all their horrors, through the dark ages, and from which they all emerged by the same causes, and progressed up to their present state of civil refinement.

CHAP. II.

*Clovis—character of his reign—distracted state of the Franks—
—Mayors of the palace—reign of Pepin—Charles Martel, —Leavigild—Ecclesiastical power—Mahomet—Saracens—situation of Spain.*

In our first part, we touched upon the origin of the Franks, under Pharamond and Clovis, sufficiently to shew the connection, which laid the foundation, as well as future support of the papal throne. We noticed that Pharamond led his Franks out of Germany, over the Rhine, and settled in Gaul ; which was at this time shared by the Romans, the Gauls, Visigoths, and Burgundi.

Clovis, his successor, at nineteen years of age, obtained a decided victory over Syagrius, a Roman despot, and established the kingdom of the Franks 486. He secured the fruits of this victory by his marriage with Clotilda, niece of Gondabaud, king of Burgundy, and thereby opened a way through the pious instrumentality of the queen, of winning the affections of the Gauls, by favouring their bishops, and flattering their religion ; and actually led all his people into the christian religion, by his own example.

Clovis, through the instrumentality of Clotilda, was baptized by the bishop of Rheims in 496, and the whole nation followed his example.

Clovis, like his queen, was a catholic ; but the Visigoths and Burgundians were Arians ; this opened the way for Clovis to make the most of his religion ; and under the sanction of the Gallic clergy, who were catholics, he drew his sword upon Alaric, king of the Visigoths, and by a desperate battle near Poitiers, expelled Alaric, and added the province of Aquitaine to his kingdom.

The religion of Clovis, like all other religions of policy, convenience or interest, without the feelings and sincerity of the heart, sunk under the full tide of his successes, and he fell a prey to dissipation, perfidy, licentiousness and cruelty. Clovis exhibited one more specimen of a corrupt religion, which has been followed by thousands, and tens of thousands of apostates, from that day to this ; he attempted to atone for his corruptions and cruelties, at his death, by building and endowing churches and religious cloisters, and attempting to regulate church discipline, which might restrain the licentious hereafter.

The kingdom of Clovis was founded upon the rights of conquest and a corrupt religion ; and upon his death, passed under the dominion of his four sons, which laid the foundation for all the horrors of those barbarous murders, assassinations and cruelties, which followed ; until Clotair, by the death of the others, again united the crown of France, and transmitted it to his four sons, in 562.

The horrors of the first division, had taught nothing from experience, to this barbarous age : and the consequences resulting from the second, were more fatal than those of the first. The barbarities and cruelties of these murderous scenes, were greatly increased by the vindictive malice of the two rival queens, Brunehilda and Fredegonda, who made every form of treachery subservient to their passions of rivalry and dominion ; until the princes were all exterminated, and France again united under Clotair II. son of Chilperic and Fredegonda, in 613.

He restored tranquillity by laying aside his ambition, instituting a new office of the nature of viceroy, called mayor of the palace ; who governed with an influence much like the prime ministers of the courts of Europe at this day. In this capacity Pepin, duke of Austratia, governed France twenty-eight years. Pepin died in 656, and left his authority to Plectrude, his widow, who became regent in office to her grandson, then an infant who was created mayor.

Charles Martel, natural son of Pepin, was imprisoned by Plectrude, to suppress his ambition. Charles escaped her power, seized on the mayoralty of Austratia, and the people supported his claims ; and in capacity of Duke of France, governed France, 732.

Upon an invasion of the Saracens, he repelled them by a desperate battle, and compelled them to take refuge in Spain. His son Pepin succeeded to the government, assumed the title of king, to the utter exclusion of the descendants of Clovis, or the Merovingian race, and was crowned and anointed king, by St. Boniface, bishop of Mentz, in 752.

During these operations in France, the Visigoths founded a kingdom in Spain, upon the ruins of a part of the kingdoms of the Vandals and Suevi. There the powers of the clergy soon surpassed the powers of the kings, they introduced a spiritual tyranny into Spain ; the bishops became the judges, and when united with the nobles, held the crown at their disposal.

Under this order of things, Spain was a theatre of intrigues, assassinations, crimes, bigotry, cruelty and blood.—Leovigild, the champion of Spain, who subdued the Suevi, put to death his son Hermenegild, because he was a catholic, and would not become an Arian. This persecution between the Catholics and Arians, extended to the Jews, who were compelled to receive baptism upon pain of death, in the reign of Sisebut, one of the successors of Leovigild. He subdued the Visigoths, added all Spain to his dominions with some part of Gaul, and Mauritania. Chintilla, his successor, banished the Jews, and enforced with rigor all the laws against that people.

Under the succeeding reign, the bishops, with the palatines, or great officers of the crown, assumed the election of the kings to the exclusion of the nobility, and they declared Wamba, (the champion of Spain against the Saracens,) to be excluded from the throne, because he had worn the habit of a penitent, when labouring under the effects of poison ; and at the same time they decreed the penalty of damnation to any king, who should marry a king's widow.

A civil war sprang up in the reign of Witiza, in consequence of the debauchery and corruptions of this prince, who was dethroned by Roderique, in 710 ; he in his turn, fell a sacrifice to those Saracens, whose rise, progress, and conquests we noticed in the first part, under Mahomet, the apostate apostle of Mecca, in Arabia. This invasion was imputed to the intrigues of Count Julian, to revenge on Roderique the dishonour he had occasioned his injured daughter. This insult divided and distracted Spain, and rendered the conquest of the Saracens easy and permanent.

Appas, archbishop of Seville, joined the Saracens, to revenge the insult ; but Paleologus, a prince of the royal blood fled to the mountains of Asturias, and founded a christian kingdom which he transmitted to his posterity, 717.

The wretched government of the Moors in Spain, was bent upon nothing but avarice, and plunder ; this, together with their civil wars, rendered Spain the theatre of crimes, wretchedness, strife, carnage and usurpation ; in the midst of these struggles, the Mahometan religion triumphed over the christian ; and a bloody revolution in the superior mahometan sects established the triumph, and dominion of the sect of the Abassides, over the Amiades, and settled the usurpations of Spain.

At this time, Abdurrahmon, or Almanzor the great, fixed the Saracen government at Cordova, as his capital, and rendered it the theatre of the arts, of elegance, and pleasure ; and by depriving the bishops of their power, with their livings, and by promoting intermarriages between the different sects, he rooted out christianity, without violence ; and led all parties into new scenes of luxury, excesses and pleasures, together with elegance and refinement of manners, which shone with the more brilliance and splendor, in the midst of the thick darkness, of ignorance, superstition, and barbarism, which surrounded them.

We have thus paved the way for a correct knowledge of the successive events, which followed upon this dark, and distressing theatre of Europe ; a theatre pregnant with events more horrid, vile and corrupt, than ever before blackened the history of man ; a theatre on which ignorance, bigotry and superstition, commixed with ambition, avarice and lust of domination, aided with all the concomitant vices, in the extreme, with all the distressing evils and calamities which followed in their train, reigned triumphant, and rendered it one successive tragedy of carnage and blood, for more than one thousand years : the effects of which still remain, and continue to distract this devoted country ; even down to these later ages of the world ; and amidst all the improvements of religion, literature, jurisprudence, the arts, and civil refinement.

CHAP. III.

General affairs of Italy—rise of Popery—Pepin supports the Pope—state of Britain—origin of the Anglo Saxons—Witenagemot, or elective government.

ITALY was now divided between the emperors of Constantinople, and the Lombards, or Longobards ; and opened a field for ambitious wars : these, the folly of the emperor Leo Isauricus, soon gave rise to, by attempting to abolish the worship of images, in Italy, as he had done in the eastern empire : this inflamed the populace at Ravenna, against the exarch, when he began to pull down the images, and caused an insurrection.

Luitprand, king of the Lombards, (a race of Goths who expelled the Ostrogoths from Italy,) seized this favourable moment to extend his dominions, marched to Ravenna, laid siege to, and took it by storm, and gave it up with all its gothic wealth, to the plunder of his army, in 728. This struck a general terror into the cities of Italy, and they submitted to Luitprand.

The edict of Leo the emperor, against image worship, (together with the overwhelming power of Luitprand,) alarmed the bishop of Rome, then Gregory II. ; he applied to Ursus, duke of Venice, for assistance ; who accepted the overture, equipped a fleet, put the exarch of Ravenna, (who had fled to Venice for succour,) at its head, and recovered Ravenna, in the absence of Luitprand.

Enraged at this step of the bishop of Rome, Leo the emperor recalled the exarch, sent a successor, with orders to destroy the bishop, or seize him, and send him in chains to Constantinople.

Here commenced the struggle that fixed the papal power. Gregory II. excommunicated the new exarch ; Luitprand turned his arms to the assistance of the pope ; the citizens of Ravenna rose, murdered the exarch, and all his abettors, or image breakers ; the duke of Naples shared the same fate ; and the citizens of Rome rallied round the pope, and withdrew their allegiance from the emperor Leo, in 730.

Fired with indignation at this outrage on his authority, the emperor sent a powerful army into Italy to subdue the rebels. The pope at the same time sought aid from France, and sent ambassadors to Charles Martel, who gladly received them, and became the protector of the church, in 731.

During these preparations, Gregory II. died, and was succeeded by Gregory III. The emperor Leo died soon after, and was succeeded by his son Constantine Copronymus, who followed the steps of his father. In 741, died Charles Martel, who was succeeded by Pepin ; and also Gregory III. who was succeeded by Zachary. Luitprand resigned to Zachary all the cities taken from the Roman see, and he died, in 743, and was succeeded by Rachis, who confirmed the peace with Zachary ; but soon broke it and invaded the Roman states.

Instead of drawing the sword, the pope went in person to the camp of Rachis, and by his address, persuaded him to sheath his sword, renounce his crown, do him homage as his spiritual father, and retire to a convent in the habit of St. Benedict, in 750. By the influence of Zachary, Pepin, mayor of the palace of France, was raised to the throne, and anointed king by St. Boniface, bishop of Mentz, in 752.

Thus was laid the foundation of the papal throne ; the succeeding narrative will show, how the stupendous superstructure was raised. Astulphus the successor of Rachis in Lombardy, aimed at the dominion of Italy, he subdued Ravenna and Pentapolis; marched towards Rome, and demanded the submission of all the dukedom. This alarmed Stephen III. then upon the papal throne, and he again applied to France for relief.

Pepin, now firmly seated on the throne of Clovis, sent two ambassadors to conduct his holiness into France, where he concluded a treaty; Stephen anointed Pepin anew, with holy unction, and his two sons, Charles and Carloman—declaring each of them Romanorum Patricius; and Pepin, in return, guaranteed Ravenna and Pentapolis, to the pope or holy see, marched his army into Italy; compelled Astulphus to restore his conquests, established the pope in the chair, and returned into France.

When the rod was withdrawn, Astulphus again invaded the papal dominions; and Pepin, upon renewed solicitations from the pope, again marched his army into Italy, and restored the sovereignty of the pope, and Astulphus again took refuge in Pavia. Alarmed at this state of events in Italy, the emperor Constantine, applied by his ambassadors, to Pepin, for a restoration of the exarchate, and Pentapolis, to the empire; to which Pepin replied, “that it had belonged to the Lombards by the laws of conquest, that it belonged to him by the same right, and that under his authority he had given it to St. Peter, to preserve the purity of the catholic faith, and this he was ready to seal with the last drop of his blood.”

Pepin pressed Astulphus in Pavia, by a close siege, and compelled him for his own safety, to relinquish all his conquests, and put the pope in possession of Commachio, the strong fortress of Italy. Pepin conferred upon pope Stephen, and his successors, forever, the exarchate, Pentapolis, (now Maca D’Ancona,) Emilia, (now Romagna,) with all the cities therein, retaining only the ideal superiority of Patricius Romanorum, (or protector of the Roman people.) Thus the keys and sceptre were united to the papal chair by Pepin, who died in 768, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and seventeenth of his reign, and left his kingdom to his two sons, Charles and Carloman.

We have now brought forward the kingdoms of France, Spain and Italy, to the commencement of the reign of Charlemagne, we will now bring forward the kingdom of England to the same period.

The Romans held possession of Britain from the invasion of Julius Cesar, (fifty years before Christ) to the invasion of the Roman empire by the northern nations 400, about five centuries. No instance occurs on the page of history, of a people so brave, that have been so much harassed as the Britons. When the Romans had withdrawn their legions for their own defence, the divided state of Britain again opened the scenes of discord, rapine, and war ; they again applied for aid to the Romans, and again rebuilt the Roman wall of Antonius, between the Friths of Forth, and Clyde, to check the ravages of the Picts and Scots. Who these daring adventurers descended from, is no more known, than who the Irish or Britons descended from ; doubtless all from the stock of Japhet, under different leaders, the same as the nations on the continent.

During the ravages of Attila, with his Huns, in the Roman empire, the Picts and Scots took advantage of the absence of the Roman legions, crossed the Frith of Forth, and broke over the wall ; laying waste the country with fire and sword. The wretched Britons addressed a letter to their former masters, (the Romans,) for aid, in this style, “ Driven by the barbarians into the sea, and forced by the sea back upon the barbarians ; we know not which way to turn from the choice of two deaths.” The Romans could give them no assistance, and left them to the consolation of that christian religion, which they had embraced long before.

Driven to despair by these barbarous savages, some who escaped the sword, fled into Gaul, and settled a province, which they called Brittany ; some submitted to the conquerors, some fled into the woods and mountains, where they dwelt secure, and often sallied forth upon the foe, and took desperate revenge for the wrongs they had suffered,

Thus harassed and distressed, they invited over the Saxons, from the heart of Germany, to secure the peace of the Island. These people sprang from what is now called Jutland, and had acquired by conquest, the greater part of Germany, together with Holland and Zealand. Flushed with the successes of their arms, they readily obeyed the call, and sent a small fleet, with about 1500 troops, under the command of two brother chiefs, Hengis and Horsa, descendants of their god Woden, in 450.

The Britons hailed them as their deliverers ; and soon saw the Picts and Scots driven again into their native wilds. Interest is the ruling passion in the heart of man ; the Britons rejoiced to see themselves freed from the Picts and Scots ; the Saxons rejoiced to find how easy a conquest such a people as the Britons, might become to their arms.

Pleased with the fertility of the soil, they sent to their brethren to come over and join in the conquest of the Island : this they readily accepted, and a strong force embarked, and landed in Britain ; here opened a scene too horrible to relate ; suffice it to say, that after a succession of severe, and desperate conflicts, the Britons were not only subdued, but almost exterminated ; and the Saxons became masters of the island ; until prince Arthur arose ; he gave relief to such of his countrymen as had escaped the murderous sword, and fled to the mountains and forests for safety ; collected a band of these fugitives, fell upon the Saxons at Badon Hill, in 520, and gained such a victory, as gave relief to the Britons about forty years. Fresh invaders having passed over from Germany, from time to time, and the Britons were finally subdued ; excepting such as fled to the mountains of Cornwall and Wales, where they dwelt securely under their own governments, 584.

As soon as the common enemy was subdued, the Saxons divided the country into seven independent sovereignties, called the Saxon Heptarchy, united under one head ; these held a general elective council, called Wittenagemot, or general assembly, to consult, and determine on the affairs of the general good.

THE Saxon heptarchy was the basis on which the laws of England, and of course, English and American liberty, were founded. Their Wittenagemot, or council of wise men, was composed of a select number from all the clans or kingdoms ; of what class or order of men is not known. Their divisions into classes, were the same as in England at this time, the noble, the free, and the servile. The nobles were called thanes, and were of two kinds, the greater and lesser thanes ; both were dependent on the king ; the free men were the yeomanry, or farmers of the realm ; but the slaves were the most numerous, and were the property upon the estates of the nobles.

The basis of the Anglo-Saxon laws, was the same as the present English, excepting the decision of ordeal in very intricate cases.* Their criminal code was more mild than the present English; all crimes might be compensated with money. This principle became the basis of the corruptions of popery. This heptarchy continued until they were united under Egbert, king of Wessex, in 827; but it was an union both transient and momentary.

The heptarchy were converted to christianity by St. Augustine, a catholic monk, about the year 600. Reverences to saints and monastic observances, were amongst the first of their moral virtues; and donations to the church, atoned for all crimes. These superstitions brought them under the dominion of the Roman pontiffs, and pilgrimages to Rome were common to all classes of society, from the king to the peasant.

Upon this throne of the united heptarchy reigned Egbert, after severe struggles for dominion, and after he had by his sword persuaded the Saxons that he was the rightful heir to Henghis and Horsa, the two first chiefs who led the Saxons into England. The reign of Egbert was rendered distressing and alarming by the invasions of the Normans, who ravaged the country, as the Danes had done before. In the midst of these scenes, Egbert died, 838, and left his throne to his son Ethelwolf. His superstition was equal to the weakness of his mind; in his reign, England was again distressed by the ravages of the Danes; and in the midst of these distresses, the king went off on a pilgrimage to Rome, and on his return died, leaving the throne to his sons, Ethelbert and Ethelbald.

The Danes still continued their ravages, and distracted this divided kingdom, until both the kings died, and left the crown to their younger brother Alfred, at twenty years of age. This young hero did wonders; but was soon overpowered, after having fought eight pitched battles in one year; he was compelled to abandon the crown, take the garb of a peasant, and pass as a servant to a grazier. Not content with this situation, he built him a strong castle in the midst of an inaccessible morass; collected a few of his nobles, and when occasion offered, fell upon the defenceless Danes without mercy.

* The ordeal of fire and sword was common to the Saxons in the 7th century.

Thus immured, like Gustavus of Sweden, he reconnoitered the Danes in their camp, and encouraged his countrymen, until a favorable moment offered, when he fell upon the Danish camp at Eddington, routed their army, put them to flight, with great slaughter; took Guthrum their king, with the remnant of his banditti, and offered them their lives, and land to work upon, if they would embrace christianity, and be loyal subjects; these they consented to, and were true to their engagements.

Although Egbert may be considered as the first king, under the Saxon union, his reign was so short, that he had only the name of king; never did he enjoy a tranquil throne; every thing remained for Alfred to do, when he came to the throne, and he was exactly fitted for his condition; he did every thing for that nation, in one conspicuous reign.

He subdued the Danes, he created a fleet of one hundred and twenty vessels, which was equal to the protection of his sea coast; established a regular police throughout his kingdom, by dividing England into counties, hundreds, and tythings; and rendered every householder accountable for his family and guests; every person who did not register himself in some tything, was punished as an outlaw; and no man could change his abode without a certificate from the head of the tything.

Alfred created county courts, and juries, in the manner they are now used in England and America, and assembled his whole people once a year, by their hundreds, not only to inquire into, and correct crimes, but also all abuses of power in the magistrates, and at the same time to do military duty; hence a hundred was called a Wappentake. Alfred framed also a body of laws, which were the basis of English jurisprudence.

He was sensible that ignorance was the hot-bed of mischief, and that without knowledge, it was impossible for any people to be free, virtuous and happy.

Alfred founded schools and seminaries; greatly endowed the university of Oxford; enjoined it upon all freeholders, to send their children to school; and encouraged merit by preferment. He studied, wrote, and practised, as he wished his people to do, and thus by precept and example, was truly the father of his country. He introduced and encouraged manufactures and commerce; lived to enjoy the elegancies and luxuries of life, and laid the foundation of all that is truly great and good in England.

In the year 901, Alfred died, (having fought fifty-six pitched battles, by land and sea,) and left in his will, "It is just that the English should ever remain as free as their own thoughts." The real worth, and true greatness of Alfred, are best known and expressed, by the general good which has been experienced in the English nation.

To avoid interruption in the Saxon history, I have continued through the reign of Alfred; which brings it forward of the reign of Charlemagne, nearly one whole century. We will now go back, and take up the affairs of the continent, beginning with Charlemagne, king of the Franks, and emperor of the west.

In the reign of Pepin, we noticed the holy consecration of his two sons, Charles and Carloman, by pope Stephen, as protectors of the Roman people. Soon after the death of Pepin, died his son Carloman, and left Charles sole heir to the crown, in 771. The Saxons had made a general conquest of the clans which were spread over Germany, and held them in subjection, after the manner of the age; where subjection and obedience were enforced by the sword only, and where ravaging and plunder were the common modes of subsisting, amongst a set of pagan idolatrous barbarians, much like our western Indians.

To quiet the depredations of some of these tribes, became the early attention of Charles, when he was called by pope Adrian I. to protect his holiness against the incursions of Desiderius king of the Lombards, in the same manner that his father Pepin had done against Luitprand. Charles had married the daughter of Desiderius, divorced her with the consent of the pope, as being without issue, and married another woman. This had given some occasion for the quarrel between Desiderius and the pope; and a serious cause of quarrel between Desiderius and Charles.

Upon the first summons from Adrian, Charles concluded a treaty with the Saxons, drew off his army, and marched into Italy in quest of Desiderius, who fled at his approach, and took shelter in Pavia, his capital, where Charles besieged him, 773. The Lombards made a gallant defence, Charles invested the city with a part of his army, drew off the other part and marched to Verona, which soon fell into his hands, together with his brother Carloman's widow, (who was also daughter to Desiderius,) with her two sons, who had been sent there by her father for safety; these Charles sent into France, and returned to Pavia; renewed the siege with vigor, and went in person to Rome to pass the Easter festival.

Adrian received Charles with great pomp, preceded by the magistrates and judges of Rome, with banners; and the exultations of the clergy "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Charles being fully gratified with this reception at Rome, confirmed again the grant of Pepin, and retired to Pavia, which a severe plague amongst the besieged soon compelled them to deliver up to Charles, who took Desiderius and his family, and sent them into France; where they all died. Thus an end was put to the kingdom of the Lombards, 774; after a period of 206 years.

Italy at this time was shared by the Venitians, the Lombards, the Popes, and the Emperors of Constantinople. After the conquest of Lombardy, it was all owned by the Pope, and Charles, excepting the dukedom of Naples, and several cities in the two Calabrias, which belonged to the emperors.

Thus possessed of Italy, Charles received the iron crown of the Romans, at the hands of the pope, with the title of king of the Romans, and emperor of the west. Charles took immediate possession, by instituting a new system of laws, a new police, &c.; and combined the civil, and ecclesiastical government, by uniting the clergy with the nobility, after the manner of France.

Having thus disposed of his conquests, Charles returned to France, and marched directly against the revolted Saxons, which commenced a war of 30 years with these barbarians, who were finally subdued, and annexed to his empire. Great persecutions accompanied this war, to christianize the heathen idolatrous Saxons.

CHAP. IV.

France and the Church, through the reign of Charlemagne and his successors, to the settlement of Rollo, the Norman.

THE connection between the French and Papal thrones, has been inseparable from the days of Clovis; and Charles increased the strength of that union, through every step of his reign. He endeavoured to compel the Saxons, by fire and sword, to embrace christianity ; with some he succeeded, with others he found it impossible ; they fled their country, and took refuge in the wilds of Norway. Charles was a real friend to religion and letters ; and to promote both these, he was a friend to the clergy, and admitted them into the government with the nobles ; but he was careful to preserve his dignity as head of the church ; and the pope and clergy yielded to him this homage.

In the midst of the co-operation of Charles, and Adrian I. for the exaltation of the papal, and French monarchies, died Adrian, who was succeeded by Leo III. in 796, who sent to Charlemagne the Roman standard, " begging him to send an embassy to receive the oath of fidelity from the Romans."

In 799, Charlemagne was called into Italy to redress an act of violence, and an attempt of assassination, offered pope Leo, in the streets of Rome. Charles repaired to Rome, passed six days with the pope in the year 800 : and assembled the bishops, and nobles, to inquire into the affair. The bishops denied the jurisdiction of the court, alleging, that " the apostolic see cannot be judged by man ; " Leo acknowledged the jurisdiction of the court, and as no proof appeared against him, he purged himself by oath.

On christmas day, as Charles was assisting at mass, and upon his knees before the Altar, in the church of St. Peter ; the sovereign pontiff advanced, put an imperial crown upon his head ; and the people exclaimed, " Long live the emperor, long life and victory to Charles Augustus, crowned by the hand of God—long live the great, and pious emperor of the Romans," and then seated him upon the magnificent throne of the Roman emperors, and presented him with the imperial mantle. Charles returned, amidst the acclamations of the people, in triumph to his palace.

High raised on the imperial throne of the west, Charles received, amidst other marks of respect and attention, an overture of marriage from the empress Irene, of Constantinople, which he actually accepted ; but it was prevented by the interference of Nicephorus, the patrician ; who banished Irene to the island of Lesbos, and settled with Charles a new treaty of limits, agreeable to his mind, in the year 802.

Charles received particular notice, and respect from the caliphs of the Saracens, particularly the caliph Haroun Al-raschid ; he ceded to him, by his embassy, the lordship of Jerusalem, and amongst other presents, sent him a striking clock ; the first ever known in France.

The Arabs had retained the arts, notwithstanding they were lost in Europe : the several successive caliphs of Bagdad, continued this respectful notice to Charles, until they fell into disorder, and civil wars, which ruined the arts and sciences amongst them.

Charles was truly a great man ; but fell into the same evil which had been practised by his predecessors, in dividing his kingdom between his three sons, Charles, Lewis, and Pepin. These, had they lived, would have distracted the empire, by their civil wars ; but as only Lewis survived, he found employment for all his time.

Charles, near the close of his reign, began to feel the sword of revenge from those Saxons who had escaped his sword, and fled into Norway : these Normans, under Godfrey their leader, landed a strong force upon the coast of France, and threatened the empire ; but just at the commencement of the fatal battle, Godfrey was assassinated by one of his followers, his army fled on board their ships, a peace was settled, and they returned home.

The relief from this invasion, was followed by the death of Charles' sons, Charles and Pepin, together with his daughter Rotrude, and he associated Lewis in the government of the empire ; and to express the independence of the crown, he placed it upon the altar, and directed Lewis to raise it on to his own head ; thus shewing that he held it of God only. Charles died at Aix-la-Chapelle in 814, aged seventy-one—having reigned forty-seven years.

The empire of the west then consisted of France, Germany, Italy, part of Hungary, Spain, and the Low Countries ; and the head of this empire was Charlemagne. When he fell, his empire fell with him ; the discordant barbarians on the north ; the intriguing, factious Italians ; the jealous, superstitious, half christian, half moorish Spaniards ; the discordant, disjunctive, conjoined provinces in France, and upon the Rhine, could not be controlled, but by the same force that subdued them, and under the same wise head.

The first step Lewis took, made him unpopular with the clergy ; this, at that age, was destruction to any reign : he next, divided up his government among his three sons, in 817 ; (Bernard, grandson of Charlemagne was in possession of Italy, in his father's right.) To add to the scene already opened for feuds, Lewis had one more son, by a second marriage, (Charles the bald ;) him he associated with his eldest son Lothario, in the government of France, by mutual consent.

He was now prepared for all the trouble, which such an age, in the midst of such discordant interests was ready to bring upon him. The feuds opened, by a coalition of the three brothers against the father, in 829. This rebellion drove Lewis to the church for consolation, and support : the church took advantage of this, and the empire was in the midst of distraction. To detail the occurrences of these scenes, would neither improve the understanding, correct the morals, or mend the heart : suffice it to say, that Gregory IV. took such advantage of these feuds, as to bring Lewis into a penitential habit, strip him of his throne, and then decreed " A penitent is incapable of civil offices ; a royal penitent, must then be incapable of reigning ; Lewis subjected to perpetual penance ; he can never ascend the throne."

Lewis, as a prisoner in the monastery of St. Medard at Soissons, in due form, was stripped of his royal robes, in presence of his son Lothario, clad in the penitential sackcloth, and assigned to his cell, for the crime of taking up arms against his rebellious sons. The scene was now reversed from what it was, when his father sat in judgment upon pope Adrian I. in Italy ; and the characters were changed. This scene was too gross even for this barbarous age. The feelings of these half savages revolted at this triumph of a son over a father ; the two brothers united against Lothario, who had degraded his father, restored the unhappy king to his crown, and compelled Lothario to crave mercy at the feet of his father, in presence of the whole army. Lewis granted it, and yielded to him the kingdom of Italy, in 834.

The death of Pepin opened a new scene for the intrigues of the queen, in favor of her son Charles the bald ; again the empire was torn with feuds ; Lewis again fell a sacrifice to his superstition, and died near Mentz, aged 72 ; having reigned twenty-eight years.

As soon as the father was removed, the sons drew the sword upon each other, and to carry their points, resorted to all possible expedients ; Lothario offered liberty of conscience to the Saxons, (that is, to return to their idolatry) if they would support his sword ; Lewis and Charles stuck to the Church : France was drenched in blood. A fatal action was fought, in which Lewis and Charles prevailed over Lothario ; 100,000 are said to have fallen in the conflict : this caused a new partition, by the help of the clergy.

Added to these troubles, the Saracens pillaged Italy ; the Normans ravaged France ; the nobles set the princes at defiance ; these all combined, rendered the empire a scene of indescribable wretchedness, and a fit " stage to feed contention on." The Normans in their ravages penetrated even to the gates of Paris ; and France was an aceldama ; kings, princes, nobles, and Norman marauders, all joined in the general destruction.

Amidst these scenes of distress, the clergy assumed the power of disposing of crowns, and held it until a more enlightened age appeared in later times. One instance of this assumption may serve as an example. " Since the divine favor, through the merits of the holy apostles, and their vicar pope John, has raised you to the throne, according to the judgment of the holy ghost, we elect you unanimously, for our protector and Lord."

Those Normans who were now ravaging France and under the protection of these feuds, desolating the finest provinces, claim our attention. Amidst the conquests of Charlemagne in Germany, he harassed the Saxons, and forced such of them as would not submit to his yoke, with their fallen country, to flee, and take refuge in the wilds of Scandinavia, or Sweden and Norway, and form a social union with those savages of the north ; and the two nations soon assimilated in their habits, and manners. They were scourged by the persecution of Charlemagne, on account of their religion ; which was paganism of the grossest kind.

Woden, their god, was to them a god of terror, devastation, and carnage : in this character they worshipped him, and they were true to their religion. They abhorred christianity, such as Charlemagne had attempted to enforce upon them. Burning with revenge for the sufferings of their fallen country, they assumed the name of Normans, (or northern men) burst from their northern wilds, and in the reign of Lewis Debonair, (son of Charlemagne) became to France what they had been to England ; appeared on the coast and spread a general alarm.

Upon the death of Lewis, and in the reign of Charles the bald, his successor, they landed on the coast of France, committed the most shocking depredations with fire and sword.

pillaged the country, and carried off their booty, together with all the women they could find, and as many boys as they could seize, to recruit their armies; they besieged Charles, burnt Paris, and compelled the king to pay tribute. This money, not only induced, but enabled these barbarians to repeat their visits, until Rollo, their distinguished chief, took advantage of Charles the simple, one of the successors of Charles the bald.

During this weak, and distracted reign, Rollo sailed up the Seine, at the head of his Normans, took Rouen, fortified it as his strong hold, and began his ravages. Charles, alarmed at the bold invasion of this daring adventurer, offered him his daughter in marriage, and the province of Neustra, if he and his followers would embrace the christian religion, and do him homage: Rollo consented, and this province in 911 took the name of Normandy, and soon became populous. They cultivated the arts of civilization with the rest of France, and became a body of good citizens, for that day, under a brave and able prince.

During these distressing scenes in France, and England too, the affairs of Germany were in as distracted a situation under the weak princes of the line of Charlemagne; until they were relieved in some measure by the election of Conrad I. upon the extinction of this sluggish race, in 912.

CHAP. V.

Germany from the election of Conrad I. with Italy and the Church, down to the year 1004.

To sever the Germanic body from its connection with France, establish, and maintain a firm, and independent sovereignty, was a task which distracted the reign of Conrad I. To settle the dominion of the duchy of Lorrain engrossed his first attention, and led to sharp conflicts with Charles the simple, king of France. At the same time the Huns, or Hungarians, commenced their ravages and depredations upon the empire, with fire and sword; penetrated to the Rhine, and compelled Conrad to purchase a peace in 917.

Upon the death of Conrad (which soon followed,) the states of Germany, by their electors, chose Henry the I. of Saxony, as his successor, in 920. These electors were composed of seven of the higher orders of the clergy and nobility, viz : the arch bishops of Mentz, Cologne, and Treves, (chancellors of the three great districts into which Germany was anciently divided,) the king of Bohemia, Duke of Saxony, marquis of Brandenburg, and the count palatine of the Rhine.

Henry drew his sword, marched into Lorraine, settled the fate of that Duchy, humbled the refractory, settled the general internal tranquillity, and marched a powerful army against the Hungarians, who were again committing their ravages in the empire ; he expelled the invaders at the memorable battle of Mersburg, and reduced them to terms.

Having there established the sovereignty, and tranquillity of Germany, he attempted the conquest of Italy, at the request of the Pope, but was seized with an apoplexy on his way, returned, died, and left the work to his son Otho the I.

The distracted state of France, at this time, under Charles the simple, amidst the ravages of the Normans, was truly distressing. Charles died in 929 : then under Lewis the stranger, great grandson of Alfred the great ; (who had been educated in England,) it was distracted with the usurpations of Hugh, great duke of France. Lewis died in 954, and was succeeded by his son Lothario, who died in 986, and was succeeded by his son Lewis V. who died in the midst of troubles in 987. With him the race of Charlemagne became extinct in France,

During this distracted state of France, Otho, that took the sword of his father, humbled the Hungarians, who again invaded the empire, at the famous battle of Dortmund, in Westphalia ; humbled the Bohemians, who had revolted, and compelled these pagan barbarians to embrace christianity, in 937 ; he drew his sword, and humbled the refractory spirit of the Duke of Bavaria, who attempted to act the part of Hugh, Duke of France.

This overbearing spirit of the great fiefs, began generally to prevail at this time, and distract the governments of Europe : to counteract the spirit of the nobles, Otho augmented the powers of the clergy, propagated christianity by fire and sword, after the example of Charlemagne ; and extended it even into Denmark, in 948. Having thus settled the affairs of the north, he prepared to redress the wrongs of Adelaida, widow of Lothario, son of duke Hugh, who was imprisoned by the usurper Berengarius.

Otho marched into Italy, relieved Adelaida, married her, subdued the country, and returned into Germany to subdue his son Ludolphus, who had conspired against him, with several of the great fiefs of Germany. Otho received the submission of his son, and sent him into Italy to quell an insurrection under the same Berengarius from whose power he delivered Adelaida, where he died; the rebel triumphed over the kingdom of Lombardy, and in his turn began to oppress the Pope John XII. then only eighteen years of age.

Otho obeyed with alacrity the call of John, summoned a diet at Worms, caused his son, Otho II. to be elected his successor, marched into Italy, deposed Berengarius, was crowned at Pavia, king of Lombardy, and Milan; entered Rome in triumph, and was crowned by the Pope, emperor of the Romans, with the title of Augustus, and his holiness swore allegiance to him upon the tomb of St. Peter, 962.

Otho, in his turn, confirmed to his Holiness the grant of Pepin and Charlemagne; "saving in all things, his own, and his sons, and successors authority." This reservation caused a revolt upon the first absence of the emperor, and John, by an unnatural alliance with Adelbert, son of Berengarius, took up arms against the emperor.

Fired with indignation, Otho marched to Rome, deposed John, and caused Leo VIII. (a virtuous layman,) to be elected Pope. Upon the first absence again of Otho, a faction restored John upon this maxim, "that no inferior can degrade a superior;" John died by assassination, and Benedict V. was elected Pope.

Fired with indignation, Otho returned to Rome, restored Leo, deposed Benedict, and banished him to Hamburg, and extorted this concession from Leo, the clergy, and the Roman people; "that Otho, and his successors in the kingdom of Italy, should always have the power of choosing a successor, naming a Pope, and giving investiture to bishops."

During the stay of Otho in Italy, Leo VIII. died, and the imperial commissioners elected John XIII. when Otho returned to Germany. The Italians again revolted, and expelled John. Fired again with indignation at the restless, factious spirit of Italy, Otho marched again to Rome, took vengeance on the factious leaders, banished the consuls, hanged the tribunes, and caused the Roman prefect to be whipped through the streets on an ass ; restored the Pope, and retired to Capua, where he received overtures of alliance from the Greek emperor between his daughter and the son of Otho, now Otho II. which was delayed by the treachery of her father ; but in the reign of his successor, the match was consummated in Italy, in 970, and Otho returned to Germany, under the appellation of Otho the great, where he died, in 973, and was succeeded by his son, Otho II.

In this reign the factions of Germany were kept under ; but the factions in Italy prevailed again, and the scene again changed ; the factions had now elected three popes at the same time, and when the imperial pope was established, the ex-pope had recourse to that power which the kings of France had delivered them from ; and again applied to the Greek emperor at Constantinople for relief : such is the caprice, such the insatiable thirst of ambition, and the lust of power in man.

Otho II. like his father, drew his sword, marched into Italy, chastised the rebels at Rome ; but in his turn, was chastised by the Saracens, who invaded Italy through the instigation of the Greek emperor. Otho died at Rome and was succeeded by his son Otho III. at twelve years of age, in 983. During his minority, the torch of civil war was again lit in Germany, and Italy ; but when he came of age, he like his grandfather, drew his sword, hushed the storms, expelled the Danes from Germany, and compelled them to receive christian missionaries into Denmark and Norway. Having quelled a second revolt, and settled a second papal election in Italy, Otho marched into Poland, at the request of duke Bolislaus, and created him king, reserving Poland as a fief of the German empire, in the year 1000.

The Saracens, taking advantage of Otho's absence, again entered Italy, and penetrated to Rome : Otho again entered Italy, expelled the invasion, returned to Rome, where he fell a sacrifice to the poisonous treachery of an injured woman. Otho left no issue, and of course a contested throne, which finally was settled upon Henry II. grandson of Otho II.

The troubles of Germany and Italy, were the same in this reign, as in that of the three Othos. The feuds of Germany, Italy and Poland, so greatly harassed Henry, that he attempted to retire from the throne in 1004, and actually took the religious habit ; but at the same time resumed the sceptre again by this artful finesse of the abbot of St. Val. " Monks owe obedience, said the abbot, to their superiors. I order you to continue at the helm of government." This was not the only expression of the weakness of Henry ; and yet he had energies which were adequate to the exigencies of the times, and the peace and prosperity of his crown continued to increase during the remainder of his reign, which closed by his death, in 1024.

I have dwelt the more minutely upon the feuds of Italy, that the foundation of the subsequent civil and ecclesiastical feuds, between Italy and Germany, and also the strife between Germany and France, for the dominion of Italy, together with the intrigues of the popes, to obtain and exercise universal sovereignty, both temporal and spiritual, may be the more correctly understood.

CHAP. VI.

England and France, from the rise of Edward I. the Confessor to the Norman conquest, 1066.

During these struggles on the continent the affairs of England under Edward, son and successor of Alfred the great, continued to flourish as Alfred left them. The Danes continued their ravages, through his reign, but without obtaining any advantages ; and he died victorious 925, and was succeeded by his natural son, Athelstan, who attempted to practice the same policy with the Danes in Northumberland, that Charles the bald had practised with Rollo the Norman, in France ; he conferred this district upon Sitheric a Danish chief, with the title of king, and gave him his sister in marriage, but not with the same success.

This occasioned a war between Athelstan, and Scotland, which secured to him a peaceful reign. He passed a law for the encouragement of Commerce, by conferring the title of lesser thane, on every merchant, who should make two voyages to distant lands on his own account. He was succeeded by his brother Edmund, in 941.

Nothing of importance took place in this reign, and Edmund was assassinated in the midst of a feast, by a notorious robber, Leolf, whom he had banished, and was succeeded by his brother Edred. He took all possible care to check the incursions of the Danes, and devoted the greatest part of his reign to extend and cultivate the monastic life in England.

The first preachers amongst the Saxons, had laid the foundation of the doctrine and practice of celibacy ; but in this reign it was carried to its extreme. Edred died in 955, and was succeeded by Edwy, son of his predecessor Edmund, at the age of 17. Edwy, charmed with the person of Elgiva, his second or third cousin, ventured to marry her. This roused up the whole force of monastic indignation ; Edwy was denounced by the monks, which proceeded to open violence and even to abuse of the queen, by Dunstan, the abbot of Glastenbury, who was at the head of the treasury, and by the arch bishop of Canterbury.

Edwy resented the insult and punished Dunstan. The arch bishop denounced the queen, caused her to be seized, her fatal beauty to be destroyed, by burning her face with red hot irons, then banished her to Ireland for life ; and compelled Edwy to consent to a divorce, which was pronounced by the arch bishop.

Fearing the royal sufferer might return to the embraces of the king, they caused her to be murdered ; dethroned Edwy, placed his brother Edgar upon the throne, at thirteen years of age, and made Dunstan regent.

At the commencement of the reign of Edwy, Dunstan with the title of St. was abbot of Glastenbury, and made head of the treasury. Upon the deposition of Edwy and the accession of Edgar, he was made bishop of Worcester, then of London, then arch bishop of Canterbury ; and held the reins of government during the minority. He triumphed over the unfortunate Edwy, by the unrelenting vengeance of ecclesiastical excommunications ; and persecuted him even unto death.

The affairs of England flourished generally, under this monkish reign ; and Edgar, by sacrificing every thing to their humor, obtained the title of St. and a virtuous man ; notwithstanding he was a most debauched libertine, and very much the prototype of Henry VIII.

Edgar was succeeded by his son Edward, in 975, through the intrigues of Dunstan. In three years he was murdered by the intrigues of Elfrida, his step-mother, to make way for her son Ethelred.

This was a bloody succession, and a bloody reign. The Danes renewed their depredations upon England, and Ethelred purchased a shameful peace. This invited new depredations, which were appeased as before ; and to revenge these incursions, Ethelred gave secret orders for a general massacre of the Danes, throughout England upon a particular day. This fatal order was as fatally executed upon all ranks and classes of every age and sex.

The vengeance of heaven followed this barbarity. Sweyn, king of Denmark, entered England with a powerful force, and ravaged the country with fire and sword. The distresses of the nation were incomparably great; Ethelred fled to the protection of Richard, Duke of Normandy, his brother-in-law, until the death of Sweyn: he then returned to his throne; but not in peace: Canute the successor of Sweyn, assembled an army, harassed the country and hunted Ethelred to his death, in 1016. He was succeeded by his son Edmond, styled Ironside. His efforts to restore the tranquillity of England were worthy of better success; he fell a sacrifice to Danish treachery, and left the throne to Canute the Dane, in 1017.

During this distracted state of affairs in England, Germany and Italy, in which we have seen a change of dynasty, the same causes produced the same events in France, and established the feudal system in that kingdom; which was now become a monstrous assemblage of members, without a head.

Hugh Capet, who had become the greatest nobleman in France, and whose influence had given law to the several last reigns, upon the death of Lewis V. seized on the crown by his address in securing the favour of the clergy, associating his son Robert with him in the government, with the title of king; and retaining his former title of duke, he secured the throne to the exclusion of the rightful heir of the house of Lorrain; established his dynasty and left his son in quiet succession, in 996.

Robert fell under the same misfortunes of Edwy of England, and became the object of the same ecclesiastical censure and tyrannic power. Robert espoused his fourth cousin Bertha; this consanguinity gave offence to pope Gregory V. and he undertook to dissolve the marriage, although confirmed by several Bishops. Robert was strongly attached to the queen, and by persisting in the connection, fell under the bull of excommunication, with all its rigors. His own courtiers would not eat with him, his own domestics all forsook him, except two; these threw to the dogs what food he left, and purified the dishes by fire on which he ate, and told frightful stories about the queen. The pope succeeded; Robert yielded to the censure, divorced his queen, who was the idol of his heart, and married a termagant. This sacrifice restored him to the favour of his holiness.

Robert refused the crown of Germany upon the death of Henry II. the last of the Saxon line ; and after having struggled long with the intrigues of Constance, his queen, in regulating the succession, upon the death of his eldest son Hugh, he died in 1031 ; and left his crown to his son Henry I. at the age of twenty-seven ; who was obliged to take refuge in Normandy, to avoid the intrigues of his mother, in favour of her youngest son Robert.

Here he assembled an army, entered France, humbled the queen, established his throne ; and Henry, in grateful return added several provinces to the duchy of Normandy. At this time Robert, duke of Normandy, set out on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, where he died, and left his natural son William, then a minor, to inherit his possessions.

Henry I. of France, and Alan, duke of Bretagne, (although constituted guardians of William, by his father, before he left Normandy ;) both became competitors for the duchy : but William, by the assistance of Henry, triumphed over Alan, and obtained his estate, in 1046. General tranquillity prevailed in France, through this reign, and during the minority of Philip I. son and successor of Henry ; who died in 1060.

At this time Canute had established himself upon the throne of England, and reversed the scene ; he oppressed the English with severe and heavy taxes, and bestowed, at the same time, great favors upon his Danish followers. This roused the seeds of jealousy, indignation, and revenge.—The English sought for an opportunity to redress their wrongs ; this led Canute to change his policy, send off such Danes as could be spared, without weakening his government, and at the same time, he sent Edwin and Edward, the two sons of Edmund Ironside, (during their minority,) into Sweden, under pretence of receiving their education ; but really for the purpose of being privately despatched, to secure the tranquillity of his throne. The king of Sweden did not comply with his wishes, but sent them into Hungary ; here they found a protector.

Edwin married the sister of his protector, and died without issue. Edward married the sister-in-law of King Solomon, and daughter of Henry II. by whom he had Edgar Atheling, Margaret, queen of Scots, and Christina the nun. The two sons of Ethelred, Alfred, and Edward, were under the protection of their uncle Richard, duke of Normandy, who had made some preparation to restore the princes to the throne of their father.

The crafty Canute resolved to break this storm ; accordingly he made overtures of marriage to Emma, the sister of Richard, and queen of Ethelred, by his second marriage, and mother of Alfred, and Edward ; this overture was accepted, the marriage consummated in England, and Emma restored to the throne of Ethelred, by the hands of the conqueror, and usurper : this marriage restored tranquillity to England.

Canute made a visit to Denmark, and by the valor of his English subjects, subdued Sweden, and upon a second visit subdued Norway ; returned home in triumph, made a pilgrimage to Rome, humbled Malcolm king of Scotland, died in 1035 ; and left his crown to his son Harold harefoot, to the exclusion of Hardicanute, the rightful heir, by queen Emma. These princes were only the steppingstones to the rightful succession of Edward, son of Ethelred, then in Normandy ; this succession at first gave great satisfaction to England ; but his weakness led him to shew the same partiality to the Normans, Canute had done to the Danes, which produced the same jealousy, and discontent ; by a foolish vow, he obtained the title of confessor, from the monks ; but left his throne open to competitors, which under earl Godwin began to distract the kingdom, and extorted from him the condition, that all foreigners should be banished the kingdom. Godwin, after having extorted this concession from the king, died, and left his estate to Harold his son.

The death of Siward, at this time the hero of England, who had killed Macbeth, the usurper of the crown of Scotland, and restored Malcolm to the throne of his ancestors, was a severe loss to Edward ; and left an opening for Harold to disturb the government of Edward, by his arms, and intrigues, and when Edward died, he left Harold, Edgar Atheling, (the sole surviving heir, who had been sent first to Sweden, thence to Hungary ; thence into England by the voice of the people,) and William, duke of Normandy, cousin to Edward, as competitors for the crown.

Harold, being at the head of that army with which he had subdued Wales, stepped on to the throne, and supported his title with the sword. Neither Edgar Atheling, nor William gave him any trouble ; but his brother Tosti, who had been expelled from his tyrannical government in Northumberland, by his oppressed people, and taken refuge in Flanders, immediately entered into a league with Halfager, king of Norway, and invaded England with a powerful fleet, and army, landed their forces, and began their ravages. Harold roused to the contest, assembled an army, met the invaders, gave them battle, killed Halfager and Tosti, the chiefs ; destroyed, and dispersed the invaders.

In this distracted moment, William, duke of Normandy, appeared in England at the head of his troops, claimed the crown, by right of the will of Edward the confessor, and summoned Harold to surrender the throne ; the chiefs were at issue, and appealed to the sword, an instrument equally familiar to both. Harold collected his forces, and marched to meet the invader, and give him battle. The two armies met at Hastings, a parley ensued ; but without success, and both armies prepared for action. The English passed the night in riot, and feasting ; the Normans in prayer and preparation, and at the dawn of day, William drew up his army. Upon the signal given for battle, he began the charge with the famous song of Roland, the renowned chief of Charlemagne.

Harold, posted on an eminence, with inferior numbers, received the violence of the onset, on foot, at the head of his infantry ; the conflict was terrible, the Normans were broken, and began to fall into disorder. William rallied them in person, and led on the charge ; the English gave way in their turn ; but resisted with firmness as they retired.

William beat a retreat, and retired into the plain, where his cavalry could act with more advantage, and the English pursued in triumph. William faced about, the conflict became desperate, his cavalry fell upon the wings of the English, they fled again in their turn ; William pursued, and again practised the same stratagem, and succeeded as before ; drew the English army into the plain, and again faced about ; the conflict was again terrible, the carnage on both sides equalled their valor : Harold fell at the head of his guards, and with him fell the crown of England : the army fled, and dispersed, leaving a carnage of more than thirty thousand upon both sides. William entered London in triumph, and took possession of the English throne, October, 1066.

If William was a conqueror, Harold had been an usurper, the terror of whose sword had reduced to him the crown of England ; not the choice of the people. By the nobility, William was kindly received, and by the people, cheerfully obeyed. An unguarded step in William, in retiring to Normandy too soon after his conquest, occasioned a rebellion that created great distress to the nation, and opened the way for the ruin of Saxon liberty, by the introduction of the feudal system into England, which divided the kingdom up into baronies, and harassed and distressed the nation, down to the reign of Henry VIII. in the sixteenth century.

CHAP. VII.

Spain and the Church, with Germany, and Italy, through the reign of Henry IV. to the year 1099.

THE affairs of the continent now claim our attention, particularly those of Spain, the Saracens, and the Greek or Roman empire at Constantinople ; these we left about the year 768, upon the death of Abdurrahman, the Moorish king in Spain. At this time Portugal, and about three fourths of Spain, were under the dominion of the Moors, Arabs, or Saracens, and of course under the Mahometan religion. The conflicts between the christians, and Mahometans, together with the private quarrels which arose from jealousy, strife, and ambition, between the divided interests of the two great parties, rendered Spain the theatre of carnage, crimes, intrigues, and desolation, for several centuries.

To enumerate the exploits of Ramiro II. king of Leon, and Oviedo ; of Almanzor, the hero of Hissem, king of Cordova : and of Sancho the great, king of Navarre, could neither interest the feelings, nor improve the heart. They all achieved some acts worthy of notice ; but many more to be abhorred, and forgotten.

During this period the same dissensions, and divisions, sprang up amongst the followers of Mahomet, as we have seen in christendom. Lust of power, and domination, armed with all the excesses of ignorance, and fanaticism, spread carnage, and desolation, not only in Spain, but in the Saracen states in Africa, and Asia, and by their feuds, divisions, and contentions, paved the way for the dominion of the Turks, which rose upon their ruins.

During these distressing scenes in the dominions of Mahomet, and St. Peter, the two feet of the Roman empire ; the main stock at Constantinople stood like a rock in the midst of the ocean, lashed with the waves, and beaten by the tempests, with here and there a fragment torn off, yet firm on its base : torn by internal feuds, jealousies, intrigues, and corruptions, it was often a prey to factions; but it preserved its unity, and its splendid excellence in the arts and sciences, in the midst of the dark cloud of ignorance, and wretchedness which hung around it.

Even here the arts were nursed in the lap of luxury, effeminacy, licentiousness, and corruption ; and even here, that church, which Costantine had so faithfully nursed, and adorned, was seated in the same lap, and partook of the same corruptions with the arts ; and here, the bon mots of Clovis, and Chilperic, his grandson, might as well apply, as in the dominions of St. Peter. “ St. Martin serves his friends very well ; but he makes them pay roundly for his trouble.”—Clovis. “ Our treasure is poor ; our riches are gone to the church ; the bishops are the kings.”—Chilperic.

Thus we have noticed with particular attention, the rise and progress of the papal church, and power, from the days of Clovis, until this time ; we have seen how the popes availed themselves of the genius of the religion of the barbarians ; of idolatry, avarice, and despotic power ; and how they raised the papal throne, upon this broad, and corrupt basis, and upon the ruins of christianity. They engrafted the heathen mythology of the Greeks, and Romans, together with these principles of the barbarians, upon the old Jewish stock : the pope became high priest, laid aside his mitre, took the triple crown and sceptre, and retained enough of christianity, to exercise the spiritual power of St. Peter, and, with the keys of eternal justice, become arbiter of the world.

Money amongst the barbarians compensated for all crimes ; this principle exactly suited the exigencies of the popes. Money purchased the frowns, or favors of the church, and the sale of indulgencies, together with the price of redemption from purgatory, raised a revenue, that enabled the popes to support the most splendid throne upon earth. These ages were not only dark and ignorant, but corrupt in the extreme ; to found a cloister, or endow a church, atoned for a whole life of the blackest crimes : this became another source of the wealth and splendor of the church.

Thus high raised to power, and enthroned on ignorance, superstition and corruption, the pope held all Europe at his nod. One example from St. Egidius, bishop of Noyon, may serve as a specimen of the spiritual style of the pulpit. "Redeem your souls from destruction, while you have the means in your power ; offer presents and tythes to churchmen ; come more frequently to church ; humbly implore the patronage of the saints ; for if you observe these things, you may come with security in the day of the tribunal of the eternal judge and say, Give us, O Lord, for we have given unto thee." Armed with such power, and such principles, with ignorance, bigotry, corruption and fanaticism for their instruments, the popes waged successful war with all the powers of christendom, by their intrigues, and spiritual thunders, (or bulls of excommunication,) and extended the papal dominion, in regular succession, until the reign of Gregory VII. : he by his triumph over Henry the IV. of Germany, placed the top stone upon this stupendous fabric of human invention, and brought all christendom to his feet.

We have witnessed the triumph of the spiritual thunders over Edwy, king of England, and Robert, king of France ; we are now called to witness the spiritual conflicts with Henry III. and IV. of Germany. During the reign of Henry III. the feuds in Italy ran so high in the church, as to cause three popes to be elected, and all to preside at the same time. Henry III. marched into Italy, deposed these popes, elected and established Clement III. and continued to control the papal elections during his reign.

Upon his death Henry IV. his son, succeeded to the throne, then only five years of age ; but the government continued in the hands of the empress his mother, during his minority. During this regency the popes recovered their strength, and the clergy of Italy had decreed, that " none but the cardinals should elect the pope." When Henry came to the throne, he became immediately engaged in a war with the rebellious Saxons, and at the same time received a summons from pope Alexander II. to appear before the tribunal of the holy see, and defend his encroachments upon the rights of the church. Henry treated with contempt the mandate of the pope, and Alexander II. died.

* In the year 1073, Hildebrand was elected pope, and took the title of Gregory VII. He commenced his reign, by proclaiming war with his spiritual thunders, against all the potentates of christendom ; but more particularly against Henry, and compelled him to answer submissively to the demands of pope Alexander II. his predecessor, and make his peace with the church. Gregory next proposed a crusade to Henry, in order to exalt the papal throne ; when this project failing, he commenced a direct attack upon Henry, accused him of simony, and threatened him with immediate excommunication, if he did not cease to bestow investitures.

Fired with indignation, Henry dismissed the legates, convoked an assembly of the princes, and dignified clergy at Worms, who passed their censures upon Gregory, for usurpation, ambition, and scandalous deportment to the emperor, and decreed that he ought to be deposed, and a successor appointed. Henry accordingly, by his ambassador, formally deposed Gregory, and called a council in Italy, who unanimously decreed, that the pope had just cause to depose Henry. Gregory issued the following bull. " In the name of Almighty God, and by your authority, I prohibit Henry, son of our emperor Henry, from governing the Teutonic kingdom, and Italy ; I release all christians from their oath of allegiance to him ; and I strictly forbid all persons from serving and attending him as a king." Struck, as with a shock of the palsy, as to his power, Henry was at once deserted by his friends, and beset by his enemies, with no alternative left, but to make his peace with the pope. To effect this he appeared before the gates of the pope, where he was compelled to stand three days, barefoot, in the month of January, clad in sackcloth, and fasting ; whilst his holiness was acting the part of confessor to the pious Matilda, duchess of Tuscany.

At length his holiness graciously condescended to admit him into his presence, permit him to throw himself at his feet, swear obedience to his holiness, in all things ; and then his holiness most graciously condescended to grant him absolution, and restore him to his throne. Thus Gregory displayed to the world the maxims of the church ; that " bishops are superior to kings," and that it was the duty of popes " to pull down the pride of kings."

Henry returned to his throne, but the storm was not layed ; Gregory intrigued with the Germans, to elect a new emperor, and they chose Rodolph, duke of Swabia, and crowned him at Mentz. The imperial throne had now become like the papal throne in the reign of Henry III. when three popes existed at one and the same time ; and Gregory held the balance of power between the rivals.

Fired with indignation, Henry drew his sword, and struck a serious blow upon his rival in Germany. This called forth the second bull from Gregory, against Henry ; together with a golden crown as a present to his rival.* This bull closed with this extraordinary apostrophe to St. Peter, and St. Paul : “ Make all men sensible, that as you can bind and loose every thing in heaven, you can also on earth, take from, or give to, every one according to his deserts : empires, kingdoms, principalities : let the kings and princes of the age then feel your power, that they may not dare to despise the orders of your church : let your justice be so speedily executed upon Henry, that nobody may doubt that he falls by your means, and not by chance.”

Henry assembled immediately a council of bishops, denounced Gregory, caused him to be deposed, and the archbishop of Ravenna to be elected, under the title of Clement III. ; again drew his sword upon Rodolph, his rival, humbled him in the famous battle of Mersberg, dispersed his army, and triumphed over his enemy, who lost his right hand in the action ; marched to Rome, took it by storm, after a siege of two years, besieged Gregory in the castle of St. Angelo, and set his thunders at defiance ; consecrated Clement III. and established a quiet succession over Gregory, who died soon after at Salerno, in 1085.

This bold stroke of Henry, raised a new storm. The Italians elected a second pope with the title of Victor the III. and upon his death, they chose Urban II. who became the author of the first crusade. At the same time, Urban, by the intrigues of the duchess Matilda, caused Conrad to rebel against his father, Henry, and assume the government of Italy, in 1090 ; who by the direction of his father passed under the ban of the empire, and he died in 1099.

Upon the death of Urban, succeeded Paschal II. He, like Gregory, kindled the torch afresh ; excommunicated Henry ; caused his son Henry the rebel, to support the faith, who after various intrigues, deposed his father, reduced him to poverty and distress, by his savage treatment, and held the throne. Thus we have seen how by a steady and regular succession of events, the papal throne has acquired the most despotic sovereignty, over the lives, and consciences of men : and how the ten horns have agreed “ to give their power to the beast.” Rev. xvii. 13.

CHAP. VIII.

The church—first crusade—chivalry, and the monastic rage.

A detail of the events of the subsequent reigns, would be only a continuation of the same feuds, and the same black catalogue of crimes. The popes claimed and exercised the supremacy, through a period of more than four centuries, compelling kings and emperors to hold the stirrup when they mounted their horse ; issuing their bulls of excommunication, and bringing them to their feet. The great subject which confirmed this supremacy, now claims our attention.

We noticed the plan of Gregory VII. (during the persecutions of Henry IV.) for a general crusade to redeem the holy sepulchre, at Jerusalem, from the hands of the infidels. This failed at that time ; but was now renewed by Peter the hermit, who had made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and on his return, came over the Rhine out of Germany, and with a crucifix in his hand, proclaimed the first crusade, throughout the southern kingdoms. Urban II. spread the flame, by assembling a council of more than 30,000 priests, and laymen, who all declared war against the infidels.

This first council, and Peter, kindled the fire ; and a second council of the great prelates, and nobles, spread the flame, by a decree, as if from immediate inspiration, "it is the voice of God." This under the banner of the cross, became the rallying point in the exploits of this mad adventure. Kings and nobles assembled their vassals, mortgaged, or sold their estates, (when it became necessary) to raise money, and embarked in the war. Peter, and Walter the moneyless, led the van, with about 300,000 men, through Hungary to Constantinople, trusting to the miraculous interposition of heaven, for subsistence and supplies. When this failed, they robbed and plundered the Jews, as the murderers of Christ, plundering and butchering all such as refused baptism : when this resource failed, they plundered the countries through which they passed, until the inhabitants, armed in their own defence, destroyed almost all this banditti, and left Peter, on his arrival upon the plains of Constantinople, the starving remnant of about 20,000; here joined by numerous other adventurers, they swarmed into the plains of Asia, where they were all cut to pieces by the Sultan of Nice; Walter was slain, and Peter escaped to Constantinople.

Succeeding swarms poured forth from Europe. The emperor of Constantinople favoured what he could not resist, and gave the christians a free passage, as they arrived, whose regular force amounted to about 100,000 horse and 600,000 foot, when assembled on the plains of Asia.

They subdued the Sultan of Nice, or Syria, and the sultan of Antioch, broke the power of the Turks in Asia minor, entered Syria, and laid siege to Jerusalem, then under the dominion of the Saracens, or caliphs of Egypt.

Greatly diminished at this time by famine, sword, pestilence, and every calamity, they were not equal in number to the garrison they had summoned. The resistance was firm; yet in five weeks they entered Jerusalem, by assault, gave the city up to pillage and slaughter, and exhibited a scene of cruelty, barbarity, carnage and distress, too shocking to be conceived of or described; and when neither age nor sex remained, to glut the vengeance of their swords, they approached the sepulchre, their hands yet warm with the blood of the aged, the infant, and the mother, and paid their devotions at the shrine of the Prince of Peace. What madness will not enthusiasm kindle, and support in the breast of man!

Godfrey, king of France, was chosen king of Jerusalem. Urban II. having lived to see the triumph of his plan, died and left the papacy to Paschal II. During this period, the partizans of the popes and emperors, took the names of Guelphs and Ghibelines, and became distinguished in the feuds of Europe. Three successive crusades of the same stamp and style, distracted Europe about two centuries. As the madness and power of the popes, as well as the low, ignorant, degraded and enthusiastic state of Europe, are more fully displayed in this adventure, than the pen or the pencil could express, I will pass over the details of the other two crusades, together with the dark, wretched and distracted period of about four centuries, in which nothing appears, but the blackest catalogue of crimes, murders, and assassinations, sanctioned by the intrigues of civil and ecclesiastical strife, competition and power. Suffice it to say, that the struggles for supremacy, between the popes and sovereigns of the several kingdoms ; the struggles for succession, claims of jurisdiction and conquest ; together with the contests between the cities and barons ; kings and barons : and civil wars, fill up this whole period, with a catalogue of crimes of the blackest dye, and exhibit such scenes of rapine and cruelty, as nothing could produce or tolerate, but these ages of darkness, this mighty struggle of religion with superstition, reason with madness, and refinement with barbarism.

A narrative of these scenes, with the achievements of the particular characters, and the events as they occurred, can give no adequate idea of the reality : language cannot describe, the pencil cannot express, the distresses of these kingdoms during this eventful period. But the crusades laid the foundation ; and by the aid of chivalry, broke the charm, and opened the way for commerce and letters, to accomplish the refinement of Europe.

Chivalry, which for its excesses became the subject of ridicule in later ages, and called forth the keen satire of Cervantes, (author of Don Quixotte,) had its origin in the eleventh century ; sprang from the purest motives, had for its object the most laudable purposes, and was accompanied with the most beneficial effects, until its virtues were lost in its excesses and extremes. Valor, humanity, courtesy, justice, virtue, chastity and honor, were the characteristic principles of chivalry : religion, without its enthusiastic zeal, would have been one of its shining virtues ; but with this zeal, became one of its excesses. Even kings paid the highest tribute of respect to knighthood.

Chivalry was regarded as the school of honorable refinement, encouraged the most delicate intercourse between the sexes, and enforced the nicest observance of all their engagements : as the standard of valor, religion, love and virtue, its influence was irresistible.

Chivalry rescued woman from the fangs of degraded weakness, oppression and wretchedness ; and paved the way for all the enjoyments she has since obtained. When chivalry ran mad, Cervantes destroyed it with his pen : then commerce, literature and the arts, became the reformers of manners, and brought civil society to its present state of refinement. Even the crusades themselves, were nothing more nor less, than chivalry upon a large scale, and produced the same effects upon society.

The monastic life was a steady opposer to chivalry : this ran into the opposite extreme : this took its rise amongst the christians in the east, and extended throughout the christian world. Not only solitude and celibacy with all their rigors, became general ; but the extravagant austerities of the monks threw a cloud over christendom.

In order to strip human nature of its humanity, they took up their abode in dens and caves, amongst the beasts of the forest, as wild, naked, and savage as themselves. They dwelt in the clefts of cragged rocks : the more distressing and tormenting their situation, the higher the marks of sancity. Some styled Stylites, took their stand in some conspicuous position, upon the top of some lofty pillar, where they stood night and day, for years ; through all the extremes of the weather and the seasons ; whilst thousands, and tens of thousands, were immured in their monastic cells, secluded from their friends, society and the world.

Society, have long since decided, which of the two, the knights or the monks, became the most corrupt ; were guilty of the greatest excesses, and became the most obnoxious to men, and to God—but I forbear : the extremes of all the virtues become corruption : and the example of former ages, ought to serve as beacons, to guard us against the same evils.

CHAP. IX.

England through the reign of William I.—William II.—Henry I.—Germany and France to the second crusade.

WILLIAM the conqueror, by his conciliatory deportment, soon found himself firmly seated upon the English throne, and ventured to pay a visit to his friends in Normandy. This proved unseasonable : he had founded his usurpation upon the ruins of English liberty, and secured it, as he supposed, by placing in the government of both church and state his chosen Norman friends, to the utter exclusion of every Englishman.

This had sown the seeds of disaffection, which broke out into open violence, as soon as the conqueror had withdrawn ; and England became a theatre of insurrection and civil war. Foreign alliances were formed, and a general revolution contemplated. William, alarmed for the safety of his kingdom, hastened back, ravaged England with fire and sword, until he had quelled the rebellion. With great severity he confiscated all the estates of the insurgents, established a despotic sovereignty, and an ecclesiastical independence in England, and set the pope at defiance, by arresting and imprisoning, (beyond sea,) Odo, earl of Kent, in the character of Bishop of Bayeaux ; who was intriguing for the papacy. William determined to humble the spirit of these haughty Britons, by not only placing all power in the hands of his Normans, but by rooting out even their language. For this purpose he caused the Norman language to become the language of the court, and of all records ; to be taught in all the schools, and become the language of the bar ; caused a survey of all estates in England, which instituted doomsday-book, (so called) which is of value to this day.

William humbled a rebellion headed by his son Robert, in Normandy ; chastised Philip I. king of France, for an insolent witticism at his expense, by carrying fire and sword into his dominions ; and died from a bruise, received in this mad career, 1087. William left the duchy of Normandy to Robert, England to William, and to Henry, his youngest son, the possessions of his mother, Matilda, daughter of Baldwin, earl of Flanders.

William II. pursued the policy of his father, in his severity towards his English subjects ; and by the suppression of several insurrections, increased their humiliation. He humbled the Scotch and Welch, carried his arms into Normandy, where he met with a perilous escape on his return, purchased Normandy of his brother Robert, for ten thousand marks, took possession of the duchy, and his brother became an adventurer in the first crusade, 1096. He humbled St. Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury ; set the pope, Urban II. at defiance, and took the prelacy into his own hands about five years.

He restored the crown of Scotland, by his arms, to Malcolm III. the rightful heir ; expelled the Danes, from the island of Anglesea : who have not since invaded England. He built the Tower, London bridge, and Westminster hall ; lasting monuments of the greatness of his mind. William was upon the point of embarking for France, to take possession of the provinces of Guienne and Poitiers, by purchase ; (a sale made to raise money to embark in the first crusade,) when he was shot by Walter Tyrrel, a French gentleman, who accompanied the king upon a hunting match in his new forest, 1100.

William died without issue. His brother Henry stepped into the government, and was proclaimed king. Henry secured the throne, by promising to restore the laws of Edward the confessor ; restoring at the same time the Archbishop Anselm to the see of Canterbury ; and marrying Matilda, daughter of Malcolm III. king of Scotland and niece of Edgar Atheling. These wise measures secured the throne to Henry, against the disaffected Norman barons, and against the invasion of his brother Robert, upon his return from the crusade.

Henry, by his intrigues, took advantage of the feuds in Normandy, seized Robert, conveyed him to England, took possession of the duchy, and suffered his brother to languish twenty-eight years, in the castle of Cardiff, where he died. Henry, by his liberality and intrigues, held at bay the claims of William, son of Robert, upon the duchy of Normandy, and by his sword established his dominion. The loss of his son William, on his return from Normandy, was made up to Henry in some measure, by a son of Geoffry Plantagenet, eldest son of Count Anjou, and husband of Matilda, his only daughter.

Henry made this grandson his heir, by causing his English and Norman subjects to swear fealty to him ; then took up his residence in Normandy, where he died, aged sixty-seven, having reigned thirty-five years. Henry was a learned, wise and valiant prince.

Henry promised to restore the laws of Edward the confessor, as a guarantee to their Saxon liberties ; but as soon as he found himself firmly seated upon the throne, he confirmed the policy of William I. and established the feudal system, with all its rigors, upon the ruins of Saxon liberty in England ; and by his confiscations, and attainders seized on great possessions. With these he enriched the Norman barons, whom he protected by his military force, and with whom he formed a national assembly ; creatures of his power, and creatures of his will, who riveted the chains of slavery upon every free born Englishman.

Despotism now commenced the reign of terror in England ; and avarice, with all her corruptions, augmented the distresses of the scene, and laid the foundation for all the future struggles of prerogative, and privilege, which cost England so much blood, and treasure, to recover her Saxon liberties, in after days. Henry carried on successful war with Lewis VI. of France, styled the gross, who had succeeded Philip the I. and who, after a wise and popular reign, died, leaving the throne of Guienne, and Poictou, to his son, Lewis VII.

Henry V. of Germany, having left no issue, Lothario, duke of Saxe Supplemberg, was elected, and crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle. He in his turn marched into Italy, settled a quarrel between the rival popes, Innocent II. and Anocletus II. ; called Innocent out of France, and placed him in the chair ; was crowned by the pope, emperor of Germany, and supported Innocent against all the wealth and force of Anacletus, who died of grief and mortification.

Lothario died on his way to Germany, and was succeeded by Conrad III. duke of Franconia, and nephew to Henry V. The family of Guelphs, under Henry, duke of Bavaria, commenced a claim upon the imperial crown. The contest was sharp ; Henry soon died, but his brother Guelph prosecuted the claim with his sword. The pope espoused the cause of Henry ; which fixed the name of Guelph to the partizans of the popes.

Frederick, duke of Swabia, brother of the emperor, defended Conrad. He was born at the village of Heighibeline, which gave to his party the name of Ghibelines ; and these epithets continued to distinguish the parties of the popes, and emperors, in all their after struggles. This contest gave rise to an anecdote worthy of notice.

Conrad besieged Guelph, and his followers, in the castle of Weinsburg, who being about to surrender at discretion, the dutches requested permission, that she and the women might retire, with what they could carry, to a place of safety. The emperor granted the request ; and to his astonishment, beheld the dutchess march out with her husband upon her back, together with all the women, staggering along under the weight of their husbands. Conrad applauded that conjugal affection which had saved their husbands from the vengeance of his sword.

During these scenes in Germany, a revolution was attempted in the government at Rome, and quelled by pope Eugenius III. A second crusade was preached by St. Bernard, against the Saracens ; another against the Moors in Spain, and another by the Saxons in Germany, against the pagans of the north. The last was a war of extermination, without one solitary convert. Conrad died 1152, and was succeeded by his nephew, Frederick, duke of Swabia, styled Barbarossa.

During the civil war in Germany, Lewis VII. king of France, in the midst of his feudal wars, caused the town of Vitri to be burnt, which consumed 1300 persons in one church, who had fled to this sanctuary for safety. This horrid act caused such remorse in the mind of Lewis, as led him to favor the second crusade, to atone for his cruelty.

St. Bernard, like Peter the hermit, set at defiance the remonstrances of Suger, abbot of St. Dennis, and primate of France; proclaimed the crusade throughout France, Italy, and Germany, and drew in his train, Lewis, king of France, Conrad III. emperor of Germany, and Frederick, duke of Swabia, (afterwards emperor) with the knights of France, Germany, and Italy, generally. Each army could muster 70,000 knights in complete armor, and the whole force according to Mr. Russell, amounted to 1,600,000.

Here the old scenes of the first crusade were renewed; the same sufferings by the way, the same excesses; and the same disasters in Asia minor. Conrad, emperor of Germany, met with a total overthrow by the sultan of Iconium; fled to Antioch for safety; thence to Jerusalem as a pilgrim; and thence back to Germany as a fugitive in distress.

Lewis VII. met with a similar overthrow near Laodicea; lost his queen by the amours of the prince of Antioch; fled to Jerusalem as a pilgrim; and back to France, with a few ragged followers, in distress and despair.

The divorce of queen Elenor, caused her marriage with Henry Plantagenat, duke of Normandy, count of Anjou and Maine, and presumptive heir to the crown of England, who carried with her the provinces of Poictou, and Guienne: all which laid the foundations for the future wars between France and England.

CHAP. X.

England during the reign of Stephen—Henry II.—the church, with a continuation of the second crusade—Germany, and the third crusade.

UPON the death of Henry of England, Stephen, count of Boulogne, and grandson of William the conqueror, by his daughter Adela, seized upon the throne, to the exclusion of Matilda, and her young son Henry. The barons and clergy supported Stephen, as being better adapted to the necessity of the times, than a woman, and an infant. Stephen, in his turn granted them every indulgence consistent with the safety of his crown; even to coin money, erect castles, and to garrison them with their own troops.

These indulgencies not only weakened, and almost destroyed the authority of the crown, but laid the foundation for those wars of the barons, which afterwards drenched England with blood. In the midst of this anarchy, David, king of Scotland, invaded England with a powerful army, to enforce the claims of his niece Matilda; was defeated at the battle of the Standard, with great slaughter, and made his escape into Scotland.

Matilda next landed in England from Normandy, asserted her own rights, and kindled a civil war, which raged with such violence as to produce a general famine, that greatly distressed the kingdom. Stephen was taken prisoner, loaded with irons, and thrown into prison. The storm was apparently hushed. Stephen was called from his prison, and exchanged for Robert, the brother and champion of Matilda, and the war was rekindled. This again was soon quelled by mutual consent, and Matilda returned to Normandy.

Prince Henry, now sixteen years of age, went over into England, thence into Scotland, thence into Normandy again; and upon the death of his father, he took possession of the provinces of Anjou and Maine, espoused Elenor the divorced queen of Lewis VII. king of France, who brought him Guienne and Poictou, and placed him upon a foundation, to recover his claims upon the crown of England.

Two years after this, Henry invaded England; the barons espoused his cause, and in the midst of the alarming state of the parties, the claims of Henry were settled with Stephen, by an agreement; that Henry should succeed to the throne upon the death of Stephen, and he withdrew from the kingdom. Stephen died the next year, and Henry succeeded to the throne.

The wretchedness of England at this time was truly distressing; famine, distress and desolation, raged on all sides; multitudes fled into exile, others built sorry huts in the churchyards; took refuge in these sanctuaries of the dead, and fed on pulse, roots, dogs and horses: whole villages were deserted, and thousands died of hunger.

Henry gave a new face to this wretched country. He dismissed all the foreign mercenaries of Stephen, and restored the charter of liberty of Henry I. ; by which means all this mighty storm was hushed into a general calm ; but the war which broke out between Henry, and Lewis VII. of France, led Henry to see the unwieldy mode of waging war (according to the feudal system) by means of the barons, and their vassals. He therefore levied a tax of three pounds upon each knight's fee ; with this money he raised the first independent army, and brought the war to a speedy close.

Henry next turned his attention to the church, where he found the sale of indulgencies, and the composition of penances, raised more annual revenue than the crown : he set himself to work to correct this : a task indeed ! The church had become the sink of corruption, and claimed exemption from all civil jurisdiction : murders, robberies, and assassinations, were committed daily by ecclesiastics, with impunity ; more than one hundred were proved upon men in holy orders, since his accession, without even an inquiry into them.

To effect this great object, the correction of the abuses of the mitre, Henry advanced Thomas a Becket, his chancellor, to the see of Canterbury ; the first instance of English promotion, since the days of William the conqueror.

Becket was a splendid courtier, gay in his amusements, fond of diversions, a jovial sportsman ; yet he knew how to render his industry useful to his master. Becket knew the motives of the king ; felt his elevated station, and determined to make the most of it. He threw off the character of the chancellor, and put on the character of the saint : assumed the severest monkish austerity, and mortification ; wore sackcloth next to his skin ; and became a beast of dirt and vermin ; his food was bread and water ; and his back was often lacerated with penitential scourgings. Daily upon his knees, in imitation of the Saviour of men, he washed the feet of thirteen beggars, and dismissed them with presents. The sanctity, and mortification of the holy primate, together with his sacred devotions, all became the wonder and admiration of the nation.

The knight of the cross, in this citadel of sanctity, levied war upon the king. A parish clerk in Worcestershire first debauched a gentleman's daughter, and then murdered the father. Henry demanded that the offender should be delivered up to the magistrate. Becket claimed the privileges of the church, and demanded that he should only be degraded. Henry summoned a council to try the question ; they were unsound. He assembled another at Clarendon, composed of bishops and nobles ; submitted the great question, which produced what was called the constitutions of Clarendon. Henry ordered the constitutions to be reduced to printing, and signed, and sealed by all the prelates, with a promise to observe them legally, and in good faith, and without fraud, or reserve, and sealed the whole by an oath. With all this, the primate Becket was obliged (though with great reluctance) to comply.

The copy of the constitutions of Clarendon, as signed, sealed, and sworn to, Henry sent to the pope, Alexander III. for the ratification of his holiness. The pope abrogated, annulled, and rejected them. This kindled afresh the austerities of Becket, and he declined all ecclesiastical duties, until he had received absolution from the pope. This he soon obtained, and then gave full scope to his obstinate ambition.

CONSTITUTIONS OF CLARENDON.

Voted, without opposition, that no chief tenant of the crown, shall be excommunicated, or have his lands put under an interdict, without the king's consent ; that no appeals in spiritual causes shall be carried before the holy see, nor any clergyman be suffered to depart the kingdom, unless with the king's permission ; that laymen shall not be accused in spiritual courts, except by legal, and respectable promoters and witnesses ; and lastly, that churchmen, accused of any crime, shall be tried in the civil courts.

The rejection of these articles by the pope, and the haughty overbearing spirit of Becket, called forth the energies of Henry. He summoned Becket to give an account of the revenues of all the abbies, prelacies, and baronies, which were subject to his management, as chancellor. This kindled the fire ; Becket intrenched himself again more strongly in his citadel of austerity, and sanctity, defied the arm of the law, strictly prohibited all his suffragans to assist in any manner, in any trial against him ; put himself under the protection of the vicar of Christ, and made his appeal to his holiness, in the face of the constitutions which he had signed, sealed, and sworn to obey. This was his style : " The indignation of a great monarch, such as Henry, with his sword, can only kill the body ; while that of the church, entrusted to the primate, can kill the soul, and throw the disobedient into infinite and eternal perdition.”

Becket upon this retired to France, where he was honored, and distinguished by the pope, and other potentates. The exclamations of the exile, filled Henry with anxiety, and all christendom with intrigue, about six years. The primate triumphed over Henry, so far, that he was honorably restored to his see of Canterbury, and enjoyed his usual honors.

Henry had retired into Normandy during this controversy, and Becket rode in triumph through England, and proclaimed war against Henry, with renewed violence, threatening with spiritual thunders, all the prelates who had assisted at the coronation of the king. All this was more than the high spirit of Henry could bear ; and he exclaimed, “ Will my servants still leave me exposed to the insolence of this ungrateful and imperious priest ? ” This armed four of the king’s household, who passed over into England, and Becket fell by the hand of the assassin.

The death of the primate filled Henry with more distress, than his life ; he shut himself up three days, denying himself all sustenance, as well as the light of the sun ; and by a solemn embassy, attempted to appease the vengeance of the pope, by protesting his innocence.

His holiness listened graciously ; whilst all Europe resounded with the praises of the holy martyr, whose sacred tomb wrought all manner of miracles ; restored the dead to life, both men, women and children ; dogs, horses and cows ; and was loaded with presents from all parts of christendom, to obtain his intercessions in heaven ; this tomb received the devotions of more than one hundred thousand pilgrims in one year.

In the midst of this religious frenzy, Henry undertook the conquest of Ireland, then in its most rude and barbarous state ; governed by the laws of force, which were executed by murders, assassination, and pillage.

After the conquest of Ireland, Henry repaired to Normandy to meet the pope’s legate ; settled his peace with the church, by clearing himself by oath, from all concern in Becket’s death ; made some concessions which were satisfactory, and this storm was hushed ; but another sprung up in its place.

His son, prince Henry, demanded accession to the throne of England or Normandy; Elenor his queen, and his two younger sons, backed by the king of France, then Lewis VII. supported the claim. This threw Henry into a new dilemma, and brought him to the feet of that sovereign pontiff, (to pray out thunders upon his enemies,) whose power he had so boldly withstood in the affair of Becket.

Alexander III. poured out his thunders most powerfully; but without effect. Henry drew the sword, and to prepare the public mind for the conflict, he did penance for the death of Thomas a Becket, by going barefoot to the tomb of Becket, and watching the holy relics, one whole day and night, exposing his naked back to the flagellations of the monks, which they, remembering the old grudge, put on severely. He then received absolution, and the reconciliation of heaven was announced by a signal victory obtained that day, by his generals, over the Scots; their king was taken prisoner, and tranquillity restored. What cannot ignorance and superstition perform! This peace in England, was followed by a peace in Normandy. Henry now floated quietly upon the tide of superstition, and enacted many wise and salutary laws, for the good of his people, and the security of his crown.

Even Lewis VII. king of France, under the influence of fanaticism, made a pilgrimage to Becket's tomb, to obtain his intercession in heaven, for the recovery of his sick son. Philip recovered, and the next year succeeded to the throne, upon the death of his father, and took the title of Augustus.

Philip II. excited, and supported an insurrection in Henry's son against his father, which humbled his power, broke his spirits, and brought him to his grave, at the castle of Chinon in Normandy, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. The whole reign of Henry had fanned that fire of liberty, which was so immediately connected, in after days, with privilege, and prerogative, and restored the Saxon privileges.

The dependence of the emperors of Germany, upon the popes, for the crown of the Romans, (beneficium Romani Imperii;) and the independence they claimed as sovereigns of the German empire, kept up a constant collision between the two sovereignties; occasioned all those quarrels which have blackened the annals of both parties, and rendered the popes so contemptible; and called forth the sword of the Othos, and Henrys to do themselves justice, and humble the haughty pontiffs.

Adrian IV. a mendicant friar, an Englishman, and son of a mendicant, was now upon the papal throne, dealing out his conditional permissions to Henry II. to conquer Ireland ; demanding of Frederic, the emperor, that he should kiss his great toe, hold his stirrup when he mounted his horse, and lead him by the bridle when he had mounted. All this roused the indignation of the emperor ; he set the pope at defiance, humbled the revolted Bohemians, conquered Poland, secured the fidelity of Germany and a tranquil throne, until the feuds of the papacy again entangled him in the contested election of two popes, Victor IV. and Alexander III.

This controversy embroiled the empire with the states of Italy, who were supported by the emperor of Constantinople, and the conflict in Italy was severe and bloody. In this civil war in Italy, the city of Milan was given up to the flames, and reduced to a heap of ruins. The emperor escaped very narrowly, in his desperate contests with the confederates ; especially in a naval action with the Venetians, in which his eldest son Henry was made prisoner.

Alexander III. triumphed over his rival ; the emperor was obliged to submit to the demands of his holiness, kiss his feet, hold his stirrup, and lead his horse. Frederic, upon this, received the submission of Italy, with the oath of allegiance, and returned into Germany, where he found more work cut out for him.

The war in Italy had raged from 1159 to 1177, and the emperor was now called to humble Henry, duke of Saxony, whose pride was swelled by his marriage with a daughter of the king of England. Frederic soon put him to the ban of the empire, and sent him off to England, where he raised up the stock that founded the house of Brunswick, from which sprang the present reigning family on the throne of England.

At this time, 1181, Saladin the great, caliph of Egypt, overran Syria, took vengeance on the christians, destroyed the kingdom of Jerusalem, and of Antioch, took these cities, and chased the christians from all their conquests in Asia. All christendom was full of consternation. Clement the III. ordered a third crusade to be preached throughout christendom ; Frederic Barbarossa put himself at their head, with his son, the duke of Suabia, with an army of 150,000 men ; laid Hungary under contribution in his route ; humbled the Greek emperor ; marched triumphant on to the plains of Asia ; made the cities of the east, and their troops, tremble at his sword ; bathed in the cold river Cydnus, after the manner of the hero of Macedon, took a disease, and died. Thus fell the hero of the third crusade, in the midst of this mad career of glory, in the thirty-eighth year of his age, and was succeeded by his son Henry VI.

Philip the I. was now in quiet possession of the crown of France, and Richard I. son of Henry II. upon the death of his father, was in possession of the crown of England. These two princes were engaged, heart and hand, in this crusade, and upon a new plan. They assembled an army of one hundred thousand men on the plains of Vezelay, in France; marched to the ports of Genoa, and Marseilles, where they each embarked his army for the holy land; were forced by stress of weather to winter at Messina; were entangled in an intrigue with the king of Naples; quarrelled with the Messinians; and quarrelled with each other: Richard seized on the city of Messina, and planted his standard on the walls; they settled their quarrels, and again embarked upon their adventure, 1191.

Richard was wrecked upon the isle of Cyprus; some of his vessels plundered, and their crews imprisoned: Richard took vengeance on the tyrant, repaired his fleet, and again set sail for Palestine.

CHAP. XI.

Third crusade continued—Richard, king of England, a captive in Germany—John, successor to Richard—Magna Charta.

THE christians had pushed the siege of Ptolemais, a strong seaport town in Palestine, in possession of the Saracens. This siege had proved fatal to Frederic II. son and successor of Frederic I. emperor of Germany, and ruinous to his army. Here Richard landed his army, joined Philip again, and took part in the siege. Here Richard displayed his true English valor; Ptolemais was taken; after a desperate defence, and the governor stipulated, "that the great Saladin should pay a round sum of money for the ransom of the garrison; dismiss two thousand five hundred christian prisoners of distinction, and restore the true wood of the cross."

Thus fell Ptolemais, the citadel of Palestine, after a two years siege, "which cost the christians three hundred thousand men, exclusive of persons of a superior rank ; six archbishops, twelve bishops, forty earls, and five hundred barons."

The martial superiority of Richard disgusted Philip ; he renewed his oath of peace and amity, left Richard ten thousand men under the Duke of Burgundy, and returned with his army to France, touched at Italy on his way, and applied to Clement III. to absolve him from his oath, who refused : and he attempted to manage by intrigues, when he returned to France, what his oath restrained him from doing by open hostility.

Richard put himself at the head of the confederates, and marched to the siege of Ascalon ; Saladin with an army of three hundred thousand men, disputed his passage ; an action ensued, as memorable as the siege of Ptolemais ; the conflict was desperate, and the carnage terrible ; forty thousand Saracens strewed the field of death ; the christians were triumphant ; Ascalon fell into their hands, and opened a way to Jerusalem.

In full view of the great object of their enterprise, and labours, a magical languor seized all the princes, they resolved to abandon the enterprise ; settled a peace with Saladin, and returned to Europe. This peace stipulated, "that the christians should keep possession of the strong towns they had conquered in Palestine ; have a free and safe access to Jerusalem, for their pilgrimages, for the space of three years, three months, three weeks, and three days." Saladin died at Damascus soon after.

Richard, on his return home, in the garb of a pilgrim, was seized, and imprisoned by Leopold, duke of Austria, who was his companion in arms, at the siege of Ptolemais, and who sold him to the emperor Henry VI. who loaded him with irons, and immured him in a dungeon in the heart of Germany. At the same time, Philip, king of France, exerted all his powers of intrigue, to purchase Richard, seize on Normandy, and even by an intermarriage with a princess of Denmark, to recover to himself the Danish claims on the throne of England.

Amidst these scenes of perfidy, the clamors of the pope, and the diet of Germany, compelled the emperor to withhold the sale of Richard from the king of France, and restore him to his own subjects ; which he did, for the ransom of fifty thousand marks : (three hundred thousand pounds sterling.) These are the princes who were the champions of the cross, and these scenes serve to shew the perfidy, corruption, and depravity of that enthusiastic age of barbarism.

The joy of the English nation, upon the arrival of Richard, was inexpressible : but the chagrin and alarm of Philip, were best expressed in this caution to John, brother of Richard, who had been his confederate in his intrigues ; “ take care of yourself, Richard has broke loose.” Richard had no sooner recovered his throne, than he carried war into Normandy, to revenge the perfidious intrigues of Philip, and his brother John. John submitted, craved pardon, and Richard granted it, with this expression : “ I hope I shall as easily forget his offences, as he will my pardon.”

Richard returned to England, besieged count Vidomar in his castle, for the sake of plunder, was wounded by an arrow, and died. Thus fell Richard I. king of England, the hero of Palestine, and the idol of England, with the title of Cœur de Lion, (or the lion hearted hero.)

The pardoned John, his brother, of Normandy, (stained with the blood of Arthur, his nephew, who was his competitor for the crown, and whom he slew with his own hands, whilst upon his knees begging for mercy,) succeeded to the throne, 1199. The inhuman murder of Arthur, drew upon John the vengeance of his English subjects : they even made overtures to Phillip II. king of France, to revenge the barbarity. Philip embraced the favourable moment, seized on Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, and part of Poictou, and added them to the crown of France. John fled to England ; here he became the sport of his barons, and the pope.

Clement III. attempted to exercise his sovereignty, in appointing an archbishop of Canterbury ; John opposed ; Clement issued his spiritual thunders, with a sentence of deposition. To enforce these thunders, the pope proffered to Philip of France, the eternal joys of heaven, together with the crown of England, if he would enforce the decrees. Philip readily accepted, levied a great army, together with a fleet of seventeen hundred vessels, to execute the decree. John as formidably prepared for defence, and all Europe was alive to the issue.

In the midst of this vast preparation, Innocent III. received the submission of John ; sent Pandolfo, his legate, into England to receive the homage of the king ; and at the hands of John, took the crown of England to himself. John upon his knees before the throne of the legate, resigned his crown, and swore fealty to Innocent III. ; this was the style :

“ I John, by the grace of God, king of England, and lord of Ireland, for the expiation of my sins, and out of my own free will, with the advice and consent of my barons. do give unto the church of Rome, and to pope Innocent III. and his successors, the kingdoms of England and Ireland, together with all the rights belonging to them ; and will hold them of the pope, as his vassal. I will be faithful to God, to the church of Rome, to the pope my lord, and to his successors lawfully appointed, and I bind myself to pay him a tribute of one thousand marks of silver yearly, viz. seven hundred for the kingdom of England, and three hundred for Ireland.” John was absolved, and after five days, again invested with the regalia of majesty, 1213.

Philip, stung with mortification and rage, to be duped by such a pious fraud, resolved to execute his purpose, even against the commands of the pope. A coalition took place between Otho IV. emperor of Germany, and John : the two monarchs assembled an army in Flanders, and threatened the ruin of Philip. This was the first German and English confederacy in Flanders, 1214.

Philip triumphed over this league, in a desperate battle near Lisle, and gained an honorable peace ; and John would have been content with destroying the French naval armament, could he have enjoyed his crown in peace ; but he was called to pass through new scenes.

England, by the Norman conquest, had become a feudal military kingdom, the despotic power of the crown was planted upon the ruins of Saxon liberty, and the people were vassals to the king, and the barons. The voice of the people had long been smothered under this oppression, and the barons had often complained of the oppressions of the crown ; now all parties were agreed to commence an attack upon the crown, and bring this weak king to terms.

Privilege set up her claims against prerogative, and drew the sword. John soon yielded, and upon a conference at the ever memorable Runemede, signed and sealed the ever memorable Magna Charta, (or great charter,) the palladium of English liberty, June 19, 1215.

This charter, so dear to every Englishman, was also the palladium of those liberties, which our fathers brought out into this wilderness, and which have rendered their sons illustrious and happy, beyond all former example. Thus we see, how the sovereign of the universe, rides on the whirlwind, and directs the storm, and causes the wrath of man to praise him.

Henry VI. emperor of Germany, instituted three crusades with the price of Richard's ransom ; one against the maritime towns of the northwest of Germany, Hamburg, &c. ; one against Palestine, and Jerusalem ; and the other against Naples and Sicily, then in rebellion. The last, he headed himself, after he had secured a successor, by causing his infant son, then in the cradle, to be crowned king of the Romans, under the title of Frederic II.

Henry waged war with great cruelty, and barbarity, humbled the rebels, and in the midst of his career, died of poison as was then supposed, by the order of his queen. The feuds in Germany raged with great violence during the minority of Frederic, under the regency of his uncle Philip, duke of Suabia, and the intrigues of pope Innocent III. which threatened Germany, and Italy, with civil war. At this eventful crisis, a new crusade was formed, to recover the holy land, and the feuds of Germany, France, and Italy, were all swallowed up in preparations for the new holy war, 1202.

CHAP. XII.

Crusade against Constantinople—Germany—France, and a new crusade—England and France—Borough elections in England.

BALDWIN, Earl of Flanders, headed this crusade. The storm first burst upon Zena, a city of Dalmatia, which was reduced and taken in defiance of the pope. It next broke upon Constantinople ; this fell an easy conquest, 1204, and notwithstanding it was the seat of that christian church, which was the glory of the Roman empire in the days of Constantine, and under the protection of the religion of the cross, to that day ; it was given up to pillage, rapine, and rage ; their churches were plundered, their altars robbed, and made the theatres of every excess ; and Baldwin, after having ordered the emperor to be thrown from the top of a lofty column, caused himself to be proclaimed emperor.

The confederates divided the spoil, together with the empire, and provinces ; delivered up the dominion of the church to the pope, and returned, abandoning the holy war to such only, as had got no part of the booty of the Greek empire. The pope closed the scene with this holy consolation : “ God, willing to console his church by the reunion of the schismatics, has made the empire pass from the proud, superstitious, disobedient Greeks, to the humble, pious, catholic, and submissive Latins.”

As soon as these champions of the cross had retired, the Greeks took up arms in various quarters ; called in the aid of their neighbors ; expelled the emperor Baldwin ; pursued, and took him prisoner near Adrianople ; cut off his head, legs, and arms ; gave his carcase to the wild beasts ; and recovered their ruined city, in 1206.

The feuds of France and Germany raged under Philip and Otho, during these movements in the east : the pope interfered, and crowned the young Frederic II. emperor, in order to check Otho. This kindled the torch with more violence, until Otho quit the field, and fled into retirement, where he sunk into contempt ; the peace of Germany was restored by the coronation of Frederic, at Aix-la-Chapelle, 1215. This feud was in its turn succeeded by a new crusade under pope Honorius III. All christendom was now rallied to the contest ; assembled their armies in Spain and Italy ; embarked for Syria, and landed at Ptolemais ; undertook several adventures, and failed ; then laid siege to Damietta, and took it. The duke of Austria withdrew his forces, and returned home ; whilst the emperor sent out fresh recruits under cardinal Albano.

This Benedictine monk claimed the chief command as the immediate representative of his holiness, which after much debate and intrigue, was by the express orders of the pope, yielded to him.

The cardinal general posted his army upon the Nile, in Egypt, where he was soon endangered by the overflowing of the river, and compelled to sign a convention with the soldan of Egypt ; by which he bound himself and followers, to withdraw from the war for eight years, and deliver up Damietta, which had been taken by the division from Spain : Egypt was relieved in 1221.

Violent disputes continued to rage in Germany and Italy. Gregory IX. succeeded to the chair upon the death of Honorius. He came out with his thunders against the emperor Frederic II. to compel him to lead another crusade. Frederic finally yielded, and embarked for Syria, yet under the censures of the pope, which he treated with contempt, This expedition proved successful, and he obtained by treaty with Meledin, Soldan of Egypt, Jerusalem, Joppa, Bethlehem, Nazareth, Tyre and Sidon, with all their neighboring countries, upon the conditions of a truce of ten years, and returned to Italy.

Here the old quarrel was renewed with violence with the pope, whose mortification was extreme, that the emperor should exceed all the champions of the cross in his conquests, when under the censures of the church. Gregory sowed the seeds of rebellion in Italy and Germany, and lit the torch by a new fulmination in the following style :

“ A beast of blasphemy replete with names, is risen from the sea, with the feet of a bear, the face of a lion, and members of other beasts ; which like the proud, hath opened his mouth against the holy name, not even fearing, to throw his arrows against the tabernacle of God, and the saints that dwell in heaven,” &c. to a great extent.

Frederic met this bull by a reply, in which he styled his holiness, “ The great dragon, the antichrist,” of whom it is written, “ and another red horse arose from the sea, and he that sat upon him took peace from the earth,” &c. This quarrel rekindled the two factions of the Guelphs and Ghibelines ; whose cities were given up to indiscriminate butchery. Gregory died ; Celestine IV. succeeded but eight days : then Innocent IV. succeeded to the chair, who fled into France, rekindled the war by a new bull of deposition, with orders to choose a new emperor.

The bishops of Germany (without the nobles) assembled, and chose Henry, landgrave of Thuringia, and the civil war raged afresh. Henry died : the same council chose William, count of Holland ; the war raged with more violence. Frederic, pressed upon all sides, retired to Naples to recruit his army, where he died in the fifty-fifth year of his age, A. D. 1250.

The war still raged ; the clergy took up arms against the laity ; all laws, human and divine, were set at defiance, and Germany was drenched in blood, until the death of William, in 1256. This opened the way, through all the factions of a long and distressing interregnum, for the election of Rodolph, count of Hapsburg, in 1273.

During this interregnum, the maritime cities of the west, in the whole, eighty-four towns, formed the famous Hanseatic league for the protection of commerce. At the head of these stood Cologne, Brunswic, Lubec, Dantzic, Thorn, &c. Italy and Sicily also changed their governments. All the good that resulted from this long and distressing struggle, must be looked for in the field of commerce.

The feuds in England kept pace with the feuds in Germany. As soon as the storm was laid by magna charta, John determined to recover his liberties and prerogatives. He secretly employed in his service, foreign mercenary troops, and sent to the pope, praying for a bull of interdiction against his refractory barons, and obtained his request. Thus armed with the spiritual thunders of the church, John drew his sword, and began the attack ; carrying fire and sword into the castles of the barons, and throughout their villages : all England was one scene of desolation and distress.

The barons in despair, applied to Philip, king of France for succour ; he readily obeyed the summons, assembled an army, Lewis his eldest son embarked, and landed in England. John was deserted by his foreign mercenaries, sunk under the pressure of the war, and died, aged 49.

John was a weak, corrupt, malicious, unfeeling, unprincipled king ; whose whole life was full of evil, without any good, but that great charter, which was extorted from him, and which will ever perpetuate his memory. John was succeeded by his son, Henry III. then nine years old. The earl of Pembroke, then mareschal of England, and at the head of her armies, was chosen protector and guardian of Henry.

Lewis penetrated to London ; but at the death of John, he found the protector not only at the head of the army and government, but of the nation. He united all parties, and Lewis settled a truce, procured indemnity for his adherents, with a free passage to France, and set sail ; leaving England to enjoy the fruits of all her struggles, under a general calm, 1217.

Henry, when he came to the throne, made war upon France, and attempted to recover the ancient provinces which Philip had seized ; but failed, lost the remainder of Poictou, and returned in disgrace, 1243. During this reign the pope fleeced England, and drew by his arts a greater revenue than the crown. In addition to this, he entangled Henry in the controversy for the crown of Sicily, upon the death of Frederic II. Finding his resources inadequate to the enterprise, he offered it to Richard, earl of Cornwall, the richest subject in Europe : Richard refused. This project exhausted England, and failed ; the pope took the disposal of the crown to himself, 1255.

The feuds of Germany at this time, led them to invite to the throne, the same Richard, earl of Cornwall, brother of Henry III. Allured with the title of emperor, he accepted, and spent all his fortune in a vain pursuit to establish his crown, and returned to England in poverty and disappointment, in 1257.

Again the claims of privilege, and prerogative, were renewed in England, and Henry laid the storm by a renewal of the great charter. Henry soon rekindled the storm ; the earl of Leicester again took the lead of the disaffected barons ; both parties took the field ; a decisive battle was fought in Sussex ; Henry, prince Edward, and all the royal family were taken, and Leicester took the helm of government ; assembled a new parliament, composed of two knights from each shire, and two deputies from each borough.

CHAP. XIII.

England—France, and a new crusade under Lewis VIII—Spain from 1037 to 1303—some symptoms of order.

THE last chapter has disclosed to us, how privilege triumphed over prerogative, and introduced the borough elections into parliament. This branch of the government, (which has been a bone of contention in after days,) became the instrument of establishing the commonwealth, under Cromwell, and thereby swallowing up prerogative. These controversies make no part of this narrative ; facts, not opinions, are the object of this work.

Leicester began his persecutions in his turn ; young Edward made his escape, the royalists assembled, a fatal battle was fought near Evesham, Leicester was slain, his army routed, Henry restored to his throne, and the nation became tranquil without further effusion of blood.

Prince Edward made an expedition to the holy land in 1270, returned the next year, and succeeded to the throne upon the death of his father, Henry III. who died aged 64, after a long reign of fifty-six years.

During this reign, Philip II. of France, had enriched his crown with all the English possessions on the continent, and left his throne to Lewis VIII. : he did nothing worthy of notice, died, and left his throne to Lewis IX. or St. Lewis, 1226, then twelve years old ; the regency was conducted by the queen mother during the minority.

When Lewis came to the throne, in 1235, he united in himself three characters, hitherto considered as incompatible with each other ; the monk, the hero, and philosopher ; and took the incontrovertible principles of justice for the basis of his reign. Lewis agreeable to a vow which he made when sick, passed four years in arranging the affairs of his kingdom, and collecting his forces, to make an expedition to the holy land,

In 1248, he embarked upon his expedition, accompanied by his queen, his three brothers, and all the knights of France, touched at Cyprus, and landed in Egypt—eighteen hundred ships carried the army and vast military preparations of the monarch of France ; Lewis found himself at the head of sixty thousand men.

The city of Damietta was abandoned by the Saracens ; and fell an easy conquest to the arms of Lewis, in 1249. This was his only success in Egypt, and this he was soon obliged to abandon by a convention to recover his own liberty, which he had lost by falling into the hands of the soldan of Egypt, in a fatal battle at Massoura : here his brother Robert was slain by his side, and his two other brothers, with all his nobility, made prisoners with himself. This treaty with a thousand pieces of gold, restored all the captives, and enabled him to draw off the shattered remains of his army into Palestine, where he remained four years.

During this time, the queen mother, by the assistance of a monk, attempted to raise 100,000 paupers in France, for the relief of her son. This proved the worst evil of the two ; these shepherds filled all France with their excesses of robbery and pillage, and in a civil war, they were subdued by force of arms. Lewis returned to France 1258, and ruled with wisdom, moderation, and justice.

In 1264, he was created sole umpire, by the contending parties in England, to settle their quarrels, and decided with that wisdom, which has ever rendered his justice illustrious. It has been imputed as a fault to Lewis, that he suffered the pope to shed the blood of the duke of Austria upon the scaffold, in his controversy for the crown of Sicily; and by the instrumentality of the count of Anjou, to suffer the pope to hold the crown.

Lewis made one more crusade against the infidels, not of Asia, but of Africa. He landed a strong army near the bay of Tunis, and attempted sword in hand to compel the king of Tunis to become a christian. The infidel refused: Lewis soon saw his army wasted with sickness; one son die, and another ready to die; and in the midst of this awful scene, the same plague took him off, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. Philip, his son, recovered, held the Moors at bay, and led back the remains of the army into France, in 1271.

Lewis made a general reform of abuses in France, corrected the evils occasioned by his long absence on his several crusades; established judicial tribunals, which checked the power of the nobility; suppressed private feudal wars; abolished the ordeal of single combat, relieved France from the exactions of the popes; and by his wisdom, virtue and justice, secured during his reign, the peace of France.

We have now brought forward England, France, Italy, and Germany, more than two centuries in advance of Spain, in order to preserve the great chain of events unbroken, through the rage of the crusades: we will now go back, and bring forward Spain from the reign of Ferdinand the great, son of Sancho, who united the kingdoms of Castile and Leon, 1037.

Here commences the reign of knight errantry. Spain was at this time divided into about twenty kingdoms, besides many independent lordships, all filled with ignorance, superstition, violence, and civil wars. The lesser sovereigns were often engaged as mercenaries in the civil wars of the kings. They ranged the country on horseback, armed cap-a-pie with coats of mail, followed by their attendants, or squires, as adventurers of the sword, and entered into the service of such kings as required their arms. The sword was their instrument of support, and war their trade; hence the reason why Spain was filled with all that enthusiasm of single combat, down to the close of the seventeenth century.

A few instances of this romantic chivalry, may be worthy of notice. The quarrel between Sancho, and his sister Aurica, occasioned his assassination, whilst he besieged her in the city of Zamora. Three knights entered the list against Don Diego de Lara, the champion of Sancho, and accuser of Aurica. It must not be understood, that these three knights attacked Don Diego at once ; this was not agreeable to the honorable laws of chivalry : the contest was single combat.

Two champions, armed cap-a-pie in coats of mail, entered the lists, mounted on horses trained to the fight. At such distance as was agreed, each took his stand, armed with a long spear ; this he held with his right hand, presented to his antagonist, with the other end fixed firm in its rest : upon the signal given, they advanced full speed to the charge, and as they passed, each met his champion with the point of his spear ; this either penetrated the armour and wounded, or killed the knight, and threw him from his horse ; or unhorsed him by the violence of the shock without a wound ; or glanced, by a side stroke, and let him pass. This was the pastime of these champions of chivalry.

Don Diego killed two of the champions of Aurica, and the third was carried out of the lists by the violence of his horse, and the contest remained doubtful. The city of Toledo was then in the hands of the Moors, and Alphonso VI. king of Castile, undertook to subdue it by siege, 1084. In this war, a renowned knight, known by the name of Don Roderigo, or the Cid, filled Europe with his fame, and brought many knights and princes from France and Italy to the siege of Toledo. The city was carried after a siege of one year, and all Europe resounded with the exploits of these champions of chivalry.

The war was a religious war, Almanzor, king of Toledo, and Alphonso were friends, and under mutual obligations to each other ; but their religions were different, and they continued so by treaty, upon the surrendery of Toledo, and both parties continued to enjoy the same civil and religious privileges as before.

Alphonso violated the treaty, by calling an assembly of bishops, and placing a catholic at the head of the bishopric of Toledo, which act pope Urban II. confirmed. This kindled the war afresh ; two knights entered the lists, and drew the sword to decide the question by single combat ; (the sword as well as the spear, became the instrument of single combat in knight errantry.) The catholic champion was foiled ; a new trial was obtained by the archbishop, in defiance of all the laws of chivalry, and they made their appeal to the ordeal of fire. Both liturgies were thrown into the flames; both were consumed, and both parties exercised their religion.

This spirit of these parties raged with such violence in Spain, as to induce Alphonso to invite the Miramolin of Africa, (or king of the Moors,) to assist in subduing the Moors in Spain. This invitation he accepted, took advantage of their divisions, seized on the city of Seville, and confirmed the dominions of the Moors, 1097. These wars drenched Spain in blood, under all the extremes of chivalry.

In 1147, Alphonso Henriquez, count of Portugal, expelled the Moors from Lisbon, and caused himself to be proclaimed king of Portugal.

In the year 1212, the Miramolin of Africa took advantage of these incessant wars in Spain, passed over with a numerous army, and threatened the conquest of the country. This, again, was a religious quarrel: knights and princes, from all parts of Europe, assembled to the war. Alphonso led the christian army, preceded by the archbishop of Toledo, bearing the cross. The Miramolin led the Moorish army, bearing the Koran in one hand, and the sabre in the other.

The conflicts of Palestine, and the prowess of Jerusalem, were renewed in the defiles of the black mountains of Spain; the champions waded in blood; the standard of the cross prevailed; and the ever memorable 16th of July is still celebrated in Toledo. The Moors were vanquished; but the war still raged, and Spain knew not the enjoyment of one moment's repose.

In 1236 appeared Ferdinand III. or St. Ferdinand, in the midst of these bloody conflicts, which still raged with violence. He took the city of Cordova, and drove out the Moors; also the province of Murcia, and the city of Seville; he died 1252; his name will ever be memorable in Spain.

Alphonso the wise, or astronomer, son of Ferdinand, succeeded to the throne. He greatly improved the learning and laws of Spain, and the improvements in astronomy do honor to his reign. He died in a league with the Moors, defending his crown against his rebellious son Sancho, who usurped the throne upon the death of his father in 1303. His reign was short but tranquil; he was succeeded by his son Ferdinand IV.; his reign was turbulent, and his death worthy of notice.

Two noblemen were thrown by his tyrannic rage from the top of a high rock, and dashed to pieces. At the moment of their fall they summoned the king to meet them in the presence of God, in one month ; Ferdinand obeyed the summons at the time, and died.

This chivalry which raged in Spain, was part of the same spirit that armed Europe against Asia, and under the banner of the cross, drenched the plains of Asia Minor, Syria, and Palestine in blood these two hundred years.

The effects of these crusades at first increased and confirmed the power of the popes ; but at the same time increased the power of the kings, which in process of time rose superior to the power of the popes. They greatly promoted commerce, and enriched the cities of Venice, Pisa, and Genoa, which were the more immediate carriers for Europe in the later expeditions. They taught the Europeans the arts and sciences, particularly the use of the shuttle and the loom ; and the manufacture of silk which soon began to flourish in Italy. Architecture made a part of these improvements, cities began to rise and flourish in Italy, and throughout Europe ; and the magnificent castles which filled Europe, with the palaces, as well as the strong holds of the barons and nobles, were the effects of the crusades.

The collisions which sprang up between the barons and the cities, and between the rival cities themselves, called for the interposition of the king ; his interposition, which generally required force, called for the aid of the people ; they made advantage of the strife, and obtained some degree of that liberty of which they were entirely deprived before ; when the wealth of the cities could support the authority of the crown by money, the king set the barons at defiance, became the man of the people, and they supported him. This secured what liberty the ignorance of the age was able to bear ; but feuds, quarrels and wars still raged.

To give some check, or even respite from these bloody calamities, recourse was had to the church. Religious societies were formed, by messages, ascribed to the special interposition of Heaven, to deter men from hostility.

One styled " the truce of God " set apart those days of the week in which Christ suffered, lay entombed, and rose again, as days of general peace and reconciliation, to be observed as a festival of the church ; this restrained the people, but not the barons

Another association was formed for the purpose of coercing by arms the refractory and the quarrelsome, styled "The brotherhood of God." These became general, supported the power and authority of the kings, and produced great and good effects. In the midst of these improvements, the code of Justinian's laws was discovered in Italy, and although little understood, yet claimed attention as a monument of Roman wisdom and greatness; was studied, and became useful.

The science of law, as a profession grew out of this, and opened the way for other professions; schools began to be established, colleges to be founded, and men began to feel something of what they now enjoy.

CHAP. XIV.

England under Edward I.—affairs of Scotland—Edward II.

EDWARD I. of England succeeded to the throne of his father John in 1274, and during the reign of Alphonso the wise, in Spain. Edward took magna charta for the standard of his reign, and upon this foundation, established a system of wise and vigorous measures, which changed the aspect of affairs, and gave order and tranquillity to England.

Edward marched into Wales at the request of David and Roderic, to settle the controversy for the crown, then in the hands of their brother Lewellyn; besieged Lewellyn in his strong hold, among the hills of Snowdon; compelled him to submit and resign his crown. As soon as Edward had withdrawn his army, Lewellyn flew to arms, and roused up his countrymen to revenge the insults of the English.

Edward again entered Wales, and by his general, Robert Mortimer, defeated Lewellyn, who fell in the conflict, and added Wales to the crown of England. Edward caused David the competitor of Lewellyn to be executed, together with all the Welch poets, that he might at one blow break the spirit of those hardy sons of liberty, and bury with them the fame of their exploits, in the songs of their bards.

Scotland next claimed the attention of Edward. The Scots had waged perpetual wars with the Picts, their neighbors, through all the invasions of the Danes, Romans, Saxons, Normans and French; and in 838 had triumphed over them, and united the two kingdoms under Kenneth II. their 69th king. This united kingdom had long been formidable to England, until Henry II. subdued William, king of Scots, and compelled him to do homage for his crown.

Richard I. absolved him from this ; and Edward I. being called as umpire to settle the contested succession to the crown, between John Baliol, and Robert Bruce ; (competitors under female claims, about one century after the death of William,) by a stratagem took the crown to himself, and persuaded them, when at a council in Norham castle upon Tweed, (in obedience to his summons, together with all the barons of Scotland,) to acknowledge Scotland as a fief of the crown of England, and swear fealty accordingly. Edward then demanded possession : this also was granted. He then conferred the crown upon Baliol ; this was universally approved, and Baliol did homage to Edward, and was put in possession.

The expences of Edward obliged him to have recourse to his parliament for money, and was the means of establishing the borough elections, which we noticed before, under the earl of Leicester, which to this day, make a part of the house of commons in England. The avowed principle of Edward, which led to this step, was published in his writs of election by way of preamble : “ As it is a most equitable rule, that what concerns all, should be approved by all, and common dangers be repelled by united efforts,” &c.

In this specimen may be seen the first features of Saxon liberty, issuing from the throne, to give life, strength, and union to a nation so long oppressed by feudal despotism, and feudal wars. This sentiment, well comported with that in the will of Alfred : “ It is just that every Englishman should ever remain as free as his own thoughts.”

This third estate (then held so contemptible in England, and throughout Europe,) has been the means of forming that great balance of power in the parliament of England, of king, lords, and commons ; these, united to their judiciary system, constituted a government unknown to former ages, and unrivalled in the improvements of man. This government formed the basis of those free governments which our fathers planted, and which their sons have perfected in the wisdom of our federal system.

As soon as Edward had replenished his treasury, and recruited his army, he made war upon king Baliol, entered Scotland, took him prisoner, carried him to England, and confined him in the tower ; destroyed the archives of Scotland, and exercised the sovereignty, 1290.

Two years after, Edward suffered Baliol to depart to France, where he died, and Edward followed, with a view to recover the province of Guienne, then seized by Philip IV. styled the Fair. To effect this, money and allies were necessary : to obtain the first, he had recourse to his parliament with success ; he demanded of the clergy a fifth of all their moveables ; this they refused, and plead the bull of the pope. Edward granted their plea, and at once placed them in a state of outlawry, by interdicting all their claims in the courts of justice, and leaving them exposed to the rigors of the law. They were soon harassed with insult, indignity, and pillage, without redress, and their spirit was broken ; here was no plea for persecution ; they yielded their supplies to the support of the crown, and were restored to the protection of the laws.

The ambition of Edward, led him to push this money exaction too far : the barons, the clergy, and the people resisted ; Edward yielded—added one more article to the liberties of magna charta, and settled the tranquillity of England. Philip, alarmed for the safety of his kingdom, restored Guienne to Edward, and preserved his popularity.

During these preparations against France, and whilst Edward was in Flanders, an insurrection broke out in Scotland, headed by one William Wallace, a desperate adventurer, on whom nature had bestowed all the great properties of a formidable leader in arms. His successes over earl Warren, (whom Edward had left to finish the war with Baliol) had acquired him the confidence of his countrymen ; the nation was in arms ; expelled the English out of Scotland, entered the north of England, laid waste the country, and gave it up to plunder.

Fired with indignation at this outrage, Edward returned into England, assembled an army of one hundred thousand men, and entered Scotland in triumph. Wallace, (now become the envy of the nobles,) resigned his command, and left the insurgents in the hands of the nobles ; Edward attacked their camp, routed and dispersed their army, and broke the rebellion ; but did not subdue it. Flying parties fled to the mountains, and carried on predatory war, and maintained their struggle for liberty, with some success. Wallace was betrayed to Edward, sent into England, condemned and executed as a rebel.

This despotic act, roused again the spirit of Scotland ; the Scots were indignant at the execution of a man, who had by his valor won their hearts, and who had never sworn fealty, or allegiance to any prince. They flew to arms. At the same time, Robert Bruce, son of Robert the competitor of Baliol, who was then in England, flew to the support of his country ; assembled the nobles, and declared his purpose to live or die free at their head. This was universally approved, except by one Cummin, who made his objections, and retired : Bruce followed, and with his sword sealed his opposition. The die was now cast. Robert repaired to Scone, was crowned king of Scotland, and the nation were in arms.

Edward was ready ; an army soon entered Scotland ; the parties engaged ; the conflict was desperate : Robert was defeated, and fled to the western isles of Scotland. Edward advanced into Scotland with a powerful army, to complete the conquest ; sickened and died ; and with his last breath enjoined it upon his successor, to prosecute the war.

Edward revived the Saxon laws, liberties, and judicial tribunals of Alfred ; made great improvements, and reduced the whole to one great system of English liberty. Edward II. (then the first English prince of Wales,) succeeded to the throne, in 1370.

Here opens a field which fully shews the contrast in the characters of men, and fully proves how much the strength, and happiness of a kingdom depends upon the character of the king. All men were prepared to see young Edward put himself at the head of that army which his father had left him, and in the absence of Robert, strike the fatal blow to the liberties of Scotland. But what must be their astonishment, when they saw him march back into England, disband this formidable force, give himself up to the society of that worthless favorite his father had banished, and leave king Robert to return to his throne, and establish the liberties of Scotland.

Enraged at this baseness in their prince, the nobility flew to arms, compelled Edward to dismiss his favorite, and hunted him to his execution.

Robert now invaded England in his turn. This roused up Edward ; he assembled an army of nearly one hundred thousand men ; entered Scotland, determined to decide the war at a blow. Robert met him with thirty thousand men and gave him battle. The champions advanced at the head of their troops ; Robert engaged with Henry de Bohun at the head of the English cavalry, and with his battle axe cleft his head to his chin. The English, like the Philistines of old, fled ; the Scots pursued ; Robert by a stratagem threw them into confusion ; the carnage was great ; and Edward narrowly escaped, by taking refuge in Dunbar castle ; from thence he sailed into England. Robert pursued, entered England, ravaged the northern counties, and filled the kingdom with the terror of his arms.

Robert sent an army under his brother to subdue Ireland, and an insurrection at the same time broke out in Wales. Edward, sensible of his own weakness, raised the earl of Lancaster to the head of the council, and consented to be governed by a minister. This excited jealousies and intrigues, and threw the councils of the nation into disorder.

Here originated that system of ministerial government, which has since proved so important to the English crown. Edward, by his unguarded attachment to his favorite Spencer, threw the nation into a civil war, which compelled the king to banish his favorite, and insult the queen.

This roused Edward from his torpor ; he assembled his forces ; took vengeance on Lancaster, who headed the faction ; executed, imprisoned, and drove into banishment all the others ; confiscated their estates ; concluded a truce with Scotland for thirteen years, and recalled Spencer. This incensed his queen ; she retired to her brother, in France, Charles the fair ; here she fell in with that Robert Mortimer, who had escaped from the tower, when under sentence for high treason ; and with the intrigues of Mortimer, and several fugitive English barons, plotted the ruin of Edward.

The queen by a public declaration disclosed her resentment against Spencer. The nobility supported her : she landed in England ; Edward fled into Wales for safety, and the favorite Spencer and his father were both sacrificed to popular rage. The queen summoned a parliament ; Edward was deposed ; the young prince, then fourteen years of age, placed upon the throne, and the queen appointed regent.

Here stands a catalogue of crimes, too black to be recorded. But what shall we say, when we read that Edward soon fell a sacrifice, and expired under the most barbarous, and horrid murder, 1327. These scenes would add one more shade to the crimes of the fifth century.

CHAP. XV.

Germany and Switzerland—Italy—France—Knights Templars.

DURING these operations in England, Rodolph of Hapsburg, who had obtained the imperial throne, (after the long interregnum,) devoted himself to quiet the feuds, excesses, and abuses which had sprung up in Germany; acquitted himself successfully, and became very popular. He suffered some disappointment in the loss of his son Rodolph, duke of Suabia, and in failing in his attempt to procure the crown of the Romans, for his eldest son Albert, whom he had made duke of Austria; and caused this duchy to be annexed to the electoral college. This gave rise to the house of Austria, in 1282.

Although Rodolph's crown had been confirmed by Gregory X. Italy had not yielded to his authority; and when he could not procure for his son Albert, the Roman crown, he endeavoured to console himself with aggrandizing the duchy of Austria, and died in 1291; having done every thing in his power for his country.

Adolphus of Nassau, was raised to the imperial throne, 1292. His injustice soon rendered him unpopular, and the archbishop of Mentz, at the head of a faction, deposed him, and raised Albert, duke of Austria, to the throne.

Albert drew his sword to maintain his claim; and Adolphus advanced at the head of his army, to dispute the prize. They met near Rosendel, and an action ensued. Adolphus, in the heat of the action, espied his rival, put spurs to his horse, advanced to the combat, and exclaimed: "Here you shall resign me the empire, and your life." "Both," replied Albert, "are in the hands of God;" and struck his competitor dead at his feet. Albert was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, 1298.

Three German princes had refused to Albert their votes: these soon became the tools of pope Boniface VIII.; but were brought to submit upon political motives, and Boniface obtained a concession from Albert, that "emperors and kings derive their regal power from the pope."

During this reign, the oppressions of Albert through his governors, roused the spirit of the provinces of Switzerland; and when Grisler the governor, compelled William Tell to

WILLIAM TELL.

William Tell was condemned by Gristler, the tyrant governor of Uri, to be hanged, unless he should be able to strike with an arrow, an apple from his son's head. Being an excellent marksman, he cleft it without injury to his son; but Gristler perceiving another arrow under his cloke, asked him for what purpose that was intended. Tell replied, "it was intended for thee if I had killed my son!" For this heroic answer he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment. Both the extremes of tyranny and oppression often become the causes of restoring that liberty they were designed to destroy.

strike off with his bow and arrow, an apple placed upon the head of his son, to save his own life ; the nation were alive at the outrage. Tell struck off the apple, and at the same time discovered another arrow under his cloke, which he declared was designed for the heart of Grisler, had he killed his son.

Grisler in a rage, doomed him to perpetual imprisonment. The Swiss rose, seized all the Austrian governors, conducted them safely to the frontier, made them swear never to serve against Switzerland, dismissed them, and delivered their country.

Albert attempted to march to the subjection of Switzerland, but his career was arrested by his nephew John, who stabbed him on his way, in presence of all his court. The enterprize was abandoned, and the liberties of Switzerland were preserved.

In the year 1309 Henry count of Luxemburg was elected emperor, crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, and immediately turned his attention to Italy, which had been neglected during the long feuds and interregnums of Germany. Here the factions of the Guelphs and Ghibelines raged without mercy, and rendered both parties the subjects of indiscriminate butchery, without feeling or remorse.

The old quarrels of emperors and popes, were now lost in the strife of factions, and the pope, Clement V. no longer safe in Rome, took shelter in France for several years.

Sicily was relieved from the French, by the massacre of the Sicilian Vespers, and the house of Arragon seized on the Island. The same spirit of intrigue, faction, cruelty and blood raged throughout Italy, and rendered it an aceldama.

In the midst of these scenes of wretchedness and distress, Henry appeared, and caused himself to be crowned king of Lombardy, by a new iron crown, in place of the old one which they had removed. Henry marched through the cities of Italy, received their submission, and repaired to Rome, where he humbled the factions with his sword, and was crowned by the cardinals.

Henry proceeded to appoint a Roman governor, and levy a tax upon the cities of Italy, "when he was taken off by poison, given him in the consecrated wine of the sacrament, by a Dominican friar, 1313." At this time the knights of the teutonic order seized on Dantzic, and purchased Pomerania of the duke of Brandenburg.

France, at this time under Philip III. had been involved in a war to secure the crown of Sicily for his uncle Charles, who had been expelled by means of the massacre of the Sicilian Vespers, 1282. This event took place in consequence of an insult offered by a Frenchman to a young Sicilian bride, as she passed with her nuptial train near the city of Palermo. The populace who hated the French, resented the affront; and a young Sicilian, fired with indignation, killed the offender.

The people assembled, a conflict began, butchery ensued; the populace enraged, took vengeance on the offenders, crying "kill the French, kill the French." A general butchery followed, without regard to either age or sex, until every French person was exterminated from Palermo. The rage then became general, until the massacre extended throughout the island; even the sanctuaries of religion were violated, and the priests butchered all the French penitents.

Philip III. attempted by his intrigues with the pope, to secure the crown of Sicily to his own family, amidst these conflicting passions; but failed, and the adventure terminated in the ruin of the parties, the death of Charles, the ex-king of Sicily, the ruin of his fleet, the capture of his son, and the death of Philip III.

Philip IV. (his son) styled the fair, succeeded to the throne. He began to form the government of France upon the English plan, under Edward I. with the three estates, which forms an important epoch in the annals of France. Philip composed the feuds of his kingdom, by the mediation of Edward I. of England, and paid him, by supporting the Scotch rebellion with open war.

Philip adopted the measures of Edward I. by exacting supplies from the rich clergy for the support of the crown. Boniface VIII. put his veto upon ecclesiastical revenues being applied to the support of princes, by his special bull; and the parties were at issue.

Boniface sent the bishop of Pamiers to Paris, to denounce Philip, and interdict his kingdom, if he did not desist from his purpose. Philip delivered him over to ecclesiastical censure and confinement, under the power of the archbishop of Narbonne.

Boniface came out with a bull declaring, "that the vicar of Christ, is vested with full authority over the kings and kingdoms of the earth." The clergy of France were summoned to Rome. Philip ordered the bull to be burnt, and the clergy not to leave the kingdom. Many, however, obeyed the mandate of the pope, and Philip confiscated their estates. He then summoned his parliament (which for the first time, admitted the representatives of cities,) they set the bull at defiance, and supported the king.

Here was the origin of the assembly of the states' general in France ; here Philip found himself supported by the nation, and set the pope at defiance. The affair ended in the disgrace and death of Boniface, who was succeeded by Benedict IX. He attempted, by mild and equitable measures, to heal the divisions of the church, and was poisoned for the good he attempted to do. Clement V. succeeded to the chair. He was a Frenchman, and took up his residence in France.

Under the sanction of this pope, Philip undertook to abolish the order of knights templars in France. This body of men were associated into a religious society of knighthood, in the time of the crusades, amongst the most distinguished champions of the cross. At this time they were numerous in France ; rich, and passed their lives in ease, and elegant amusements, as gentlemen of France.

Philip denounced the order, doomed them all to imprisonment, throughout France, in one day, and published the most daring accusations against them. To support these accusations, he put them to the rack, to extort confessions of their guilt. Some denied the charges, and died with firmness : some, through weakness, confessed whatever they were charged with ; others declared the absurdity of such proceedings, and plead the religion, zeal, and gallant exploits which had so long rendered their order illustrious ; but all without effect. They were rich : lived at ease ; and their destruction was sealed. This vindictive persecution was pursued, until the rack, the scaffold, and the flames ; exterminated the templars in France ; and Philip confiscated their estates.

Clement V. yet in France, assembled a council at Vienna, abolished the whole order, and thus by the plenitude of his power confirmed their ruin, in 1312. This bull of the pope led to the same violence against the templars throughout Europe. They were thrown into prison, sacrificed and plundered, and their estates confiscated. Philip soon sunk under the weight of such accumulated guilt and distress ; languished with a consumption, and died in the forty-seventh year of his age, A. D. 1314.

Philip was succeeded by his son Lewis X. Avarice and cruelty, with some ambition, were the characteristics of his reign, and he died in 1316.

CHAP. XVI.

France and the Salic Law—England and Scotland—England and France—Battle of Cressy.

THE momentary appearance of a female succession, in an infant daughter of Lewis X. was sufficient to call the attention of the French nation to the Salic law, which excluded all females from the throne of France. This supposed law, was found to exist only in usage, or custom, borrowed from the Salian tribe, who dwelt in Gaul when Pharamond came over the Rhine with his Franks. This usage, amongst those barbarians, so essential to their safety and peace in that barbarous age, was adopted into the government of the Franks, and continues to be the usage of France. In defect of male issue, Philip de Valois, cousin of Lewis, succeeded to the throne, 1328.

This dispute in France, opened a field for the talents of Edward III. king of England. When Edward had caused the persecutions which were carried on by earl Mortimer, and the queen mother, against the earl of Kent, and the earl of Lancaster, to be suppressed, by giving up Mortimer to the vengeance of an incensed nobility, and the queen to the judgment of his parliament; he gave his attention to those abuses which had arisen out of the murder of his father. He issued orders to the judges, to cause the laws to be executed upon all criminals, of whatever class, or distinction. He soon suppressed the murderous depredations of the barons; and the ministers of justice, by their vigilance and rigid execution of the laws, restored the public order and tranquillity.

Under this prosperous state of affairs, Edward turned his attention to the rebellious Scots. The renowned Bruce, who had recovered the liberties of his country by his treaty with earl Mortimer, as regent, was now dead, and the crown was in the hands of Randolph, earl of Murray, as a regent for David, the son of Bruce, then a minor.

Edward Baliol, (son of John Baliol, the former competitor of the former Robert Bruce,) was now immured in a French prison by a suit of lord Beaumont, a baron of England, upon a contested claim in Scotland. Many other English noblemen were in the same condition with Baliol.

These all made application to Edward III. to assist them in the recovery of their liberties and estates. Edward encouraged, what he considered unwise openly to avow ; Baliol was released from confinement, together with the other English nobles ; revived his claims to the crown of Scotland, assembled a force of about three thousand men, and with his adherents, landed in Scotland. Bruce, the victorious, was gone ; the earl of Murray was gone ; and lord Douglas was on a crusade in Spain against the Moors.

Baliol availed himself of this state of affairs, attacked the earl of Mar, (who was ready to receive him, with forty thousand men ;) routed, and put to flight his army with great slaughter ; followed his victory into the heart of Scotland, took Perth, and arrived at Scone, where he was crowned ; thus Scotland was subdued with an army of three thousand men.

The good fortune of king Baliol caused his ruin ; he, for some unwise purpose, dismissed his English followers, and in this weak situation Lord Douglas surprised him by a sudden attack, routed and dispersed his army, slew his brother, and pursued him into England, a fugitive in distress.

Edward could no longer conceal what it now became his interest to support ; he yielded to the overtures of king Baliol, raised an army, and entered Scotland to restore the king. The two armies met at Haledown-Hill, a desperate action was fought, thirty-one thousand Scots were slain, the nobility were all destroyed or taken, a parliament was assembled, Baliol restored to the throne, the superiority again acknowledged, and Edward received the fealty of Scotland, 1334. In two years the Scots rebelled, expelled Baliol, recovered their liberties, set Edward and his army at defiance, and the intrigues of France supported their claims.

This interference of France kindled a resentment in the breast of Edward, and he resolved to remove this opposition by putting in his claim to the contested crown of France. During this paper controversy of claims, Robert de Artois, brother-in-law to Philip VI. a valiant Prince, fled from the persecutions of Philip, and took refuge at the court of Edward.

The address of Robert to Edward was, " I made Philip VI. king of France, and with your assistance I will depose him for his ingratitude." This language gratified the resentment of Edward, and the field of controversy was now open, that field of controversy, which kindled a train of passions that have never been extinguished, and which can never be extinguished, so long as the independence of the two nations shall continue to exist.

The predecessors of Philip VI. had excited a jealousy in the low countries (or Flanders) towards the French, and the ambition of Philip the fair had fanned the flame—here Edward turned his attention for alliance and support in the war he contemplated against France.

His first object was to find a demagogue whom he could attach to his interest, and who could unite the Flemings in his cause ; such a man he soon found in James D'Arteville, a brewer of Ghent. This was the most popular and influential man in Flanders, who was ready to throw all his influence into the scale of the king of England.

Edward who had secured the support of his father-in-law the duke of Hainault, the duke of Brabant, the archbishop of Cologne, the duke of Guelder, the marquis of Juliers, and the count of Namar, had opened the way for his future movements, and was ready to put all his vast plans and preparations into operation.

Edward embarked a body of troops, repaired to Flanders, set up his claim to the crown of France, and the allies with D'Arteville, and his Flemings were ready to support his claims. Philip was prepared, and the campaign in Flanders was opened ; long and intriguing conferences wasted the season, the armies remained inactive, and little was done. Edward, distressed for money and supplies, abandoned his enterprise, and returned to England.

The next season opened the theatre of war upon the water. Edward, with a powerful fleet, obtained a signal victory over the French, took and destroyed one hundred and thirty ships, and killed thirty thousand men. Both admirals fell in the engagement.

Flushed with the splendor of this victory, Edward again assembled an army, embarked for Flanders, joined the allies as before, and began his operations, by invading the frontiers of France, at the head of more than one hundred thousand men.

Philip acted the Fabius, declined the combat, and left Edward the employment of wasting the campaign in fruitless

sieges. Edward, tired of this warfare, and impatient to end a war he was in no situation to prolong, for the want of money, sent a challenge to Philip to decide their claims by single combat. Philip replied "It does not become a vassal to challenge his liege lord," (referring to Edward's homage for Guienne in France.) This was conclusive, and a truce was concluded for one year, 1340.

This truce opened the way for a new scene which brought into view the splendid talents of the countess of Mountfort. The count of Mountfort seized on the duchy of Brittany, in exclusion to Charles of Blois, brother of Philip VI. repaired to the court of Edward, and negotiated an alliance, by offering to do homage to Edward for Brittany, as king of France. The terms were soon settled, and the parties prepared for action; the count was taken prisoner soon after, and the countess stepped in and assumed the defence. Fired with indignation for the wrongs of her husband, she viewed in person all the fortresses of defence, supplied and animated the garrisons, and waited at Hennebone the succours of Edward.

Charles entered the duchy, laid siege to Hennebone, determined to secure the duchess before the succours of Edward could arrive; the prize was the duchy of Brittany and the countess of Mountfort, and the efforts of the siege were conducted accordingly; attacks were frequent, sharp, and even desperate and bloody; the defence was rendered desperate by the all-commanding presence of the countess, a breach was made in the walls, the conflict became still more desperate, the garrison were weakened by their repeated conflicts and losses, despair began to seize on the citizens, and the countess ascended her tower once more, to take a view of that sea, from which she had so often looked in vain for Edward her deliverer.

She discovered the fleet; Edward had sent Sir Walter Manny to the relief of the countess, his fleet entered the harbor, landed his troops, joined the besieged, made a desperate sally, drove Charles from his camp, and saved the town.

The war now raged with fresh violence; Charles redoubled his efforts; Sir Walter did valiantly; with inferior numbers; Edward sent over a reinforcement under Robert of Artois; Robert was slain, Edward then went in person, a truce was concluded for three years; and the countess held quiet possession of Brittany, 1343.

The parliament of England now became useful to the crown : they entered with spirit into the war, granted liberal supplies, and by their zeal, Edward invaded Normandy the next year, to recover the possessions of his ancestors. This enterprize was successful in Normandy, and led Edward to the gates of Paris ; but Philip, at the head of one hundred thousand men, compelled Edward to retire towards Flanders. His situation now became critical : the river Somme obstructed his march, and covered the position of De Fay, at the head of a powerful army, who had destroyed the bridges.

Pressed on his front and rear by two such powerful armies in the heart of France, Edward saw that safety depended on immediate action. He drew his sword at the head of his army, plunged into the river, like the hero of Macedon, at the Grannicus, attacked De Fay, drove him from his position, and recovered the plains, at the critical moment when Philip came up with his whole army. Edward was delivered !

That tide, which at its ebb had opened a passage for the English army, now by its return, obstructed the French. So critical are the operations of war. Edward, resolved to avail himself of his successes, and turn the ardor of his troops to his best advantage ; took a position near Cressy, and waited the approach of Philip.

Philip advanced ; the onset commenced at 3 o'clock—the conflict was general, desperate and bloody. Edward was victorious—Philip fled—Edward pursued, and the carnage was terrible : forty thousand French strewed the plains of Cressy, and night only, saved Philip and his army from total ruin, August 26th, 1346. The young prince Edward, distinguished himself in the action, and shewed that he was worthy of his sire. Here was the first trial of cannon in the wars of Europe : Edward supported his line by four pieces of iron cannon. Edward left Philip to pursue his flight, drew off his army, and invested Calais.

CHAP. XVII.

England and Scotland—general plague—invasion of France by Edward the black Prince—battle of Poitiers—civil wars of France—Edward the Black Prince renews the war with France—peace and conditions.

PHILIP VI. by his intrigues, excited a war in Scotland, in order to weaken Edward, and cramp his ambitious plans against France. For this purpose David Bruce, (descendant of the great Robert,) who had been seated upon the throne of Scotland, assembled an army, and entered England victorious.

England was now doubly armed—Edward was in France, contending for the crown of that kingdom, which perpetuates the custom of the Salian tribe, and deems woman unfit to rule. Edward's queen, Philippa, was in England, to support the royal power, and secure the peace of the realm.

Fired with just indignation at the daring invasion of David, Philippa put herself at the head of twelve thousand men, and marched out to meet the marauder—an action commenced; the Scots were overthrown with great slaughter; fifteen thousand fell in the action, with their principal chiefs; David, and his nobility were taken; England was delivered, and Philippa triumphant Oct. 17, 1346.

This signal exploit, at this critical moment, was a severe philippic upon the Salic law, and might have taught France that woman could rule. Philippa secured her royal prisoner, set sail for France, and joined Edward before Calais. The siege was pushed with vigor, and in twelve months, Calais added one more trophy to the successes of Edward.

Pope Clement VI. sent his legate as a mediator between the parties: a truce was settled, Calais was confirmed to Edward, and he returned to England, 1348.

The successes of Edward, and queen Philippa, kindled a spirit of ambition and emulation, in the court of Edward, unknown before in England. Chivalry and gallantry, tempered with English manners, gave a lustre to the English, unrivalled, if not unknown, in Europe: and amidst the festivity of these scenes, an incident, innocent and trifling in itself, gave rise to this memorable motto. "Honi soit qui mal y pense:" (evil to him that evil thinks.) This motto with its incident, occasioned the order of the garter, by Edward, 1350.

Amidst the excesses of the passions of this age, God visited the earth with his judgments, by pestilence, as well as by the sword. A general plague prevailed throughout Asia, Africa, and Europe, and swept off about one third of the whole family of man. Wars were suspended : dissipation was changed into gloom ; and the whole earth became one great hospital of the sick, the dying, and the dead. Fifty thousand fell a sacrifice in the single city of London.

Philip the VI. died, and left his throne to his son John III. 1350. During this reign, a civil war raged in France, headed by Charles, king of Navarre, surnamed the bad. This appellation was the more forcibly true, when contrasted with the good qualities of John. Charles sprang from Lewis X. by the mother's side, and laid claim to the crown of France. He made court to Edward III. ; excited Charles, the eldest son of John II. to favour his plans ; and filled France with his intrigues. In the midst of these scenes, Charles repented of his folly, and did penance, by delivering the king of Navarre, and other nobles of his party into the hands of his father John, who delivered them up to execution, and imprisoned the king of Navarre.

In the midst of these scenes, the truce with Edward at Calais was closed, and war was renewed. The prince of Wales, who had signalized himself at the battle of Cressy, took the field, and penetrated, like his father, into the heart of France, at the head of only twelve thousand men. John assembled sixty thousand, took the field, and met the prince near Poitiers ; Edward, with his little army were immediately surrounded, and all hope of escape cut off.

John, at the head of his superior army, was too impatient to wait the regular fall of the prince, by a want of supplies ; but drew his sword, and advanced to the conflict, determined to reduce him at a blow. Edward was ready—the crisis was desperate, and the conflict terrible ; the English received the shock with firmness ; the French were charged in their turn, broken, routed, and fled ; the carnage was great, and John a prisoner. Edward received the captive king with great dignity, and complacency, and gave God the praise, Sept. 19, 1356.

Edward, styled the black prince, (from the colour of his armour,) concluded a truce of two years, and conducted the captive king to England, where he continued to discover the same greatness of soul, in his amiable and dignified deportment to king John, and rendered his residence in England such as became a king. David, king of Scotland, was at this time the companion of the king of France in captivity in England.

The affairs of France were now become desperate. Charles, the dauphin prince, (so styled from the province of Dauphiny's being annexed to the crown, like the principality of Wales in England,) assumed the reins of government in the absence of his father, and to provide supplies for the support of the crown, had recourse to his states' general, after the manner of Edward III. of England ; but not with the same success. They met him ; but with demands to redress their own grievances, and to deliver the king of Navarre, (Charles the bad.)

Marcel, provost of Paris, espoused the cause of the assembly, put himself at the head of the populace of Paris, murdered all the great mareschals of France, in the presence of the dauphin, threatened all the court, and held the dauphin under their control ; Charles withdrew, and they levied open war.

All France took the alarm, flew to arms, and assumed the government ; the days of the fifth century were renewed ; anarchy, rapine, desolation, and carnage, ravaged France. The war of peasants against the Nobles, or more extensively, the poor against the rich, filled France with every description of cruelty, and unhallowed barbarity ; neither age nor sex were spared ; the castles of the nobles were pillaged, sacked, and destroyed, their proprietors hunted like wild beasts of the forest, and France filled with excesses too shocking to relate.

The tocsin of the late revolution, marked then, the title page of this first revolutionary volume : " Peace with the cottage, war with the palace." Nine thousand of these unhallowed sons of rapine, burst into the city of Meaux, where the princess of the Dauphin, the duchess of Orleans, and more than three hundred other ladies of distinction had taken shelter. Chivalry armed with the protecting sword of the illustrious Count-de-Foix, the Captal de Buche, with sixty other knights, flew to their relief, and by their desperate valor drove off the boors, protected defenceless innocence, and added one more illustrious example, that chivalry was the protector of chastity and virtue.

During these scenes, Charles, king of Navarre, made his escape, set up his claim to the crown of France, and became the head of the banditti. The death of Marcel distracted the mob of Paris, and they began to feel the pressure of distress, and turned their attention to the dauphin to restore tranquillity.

This change in the capital, became general ; and order was restored to France, as far as the situation of the nation under their distresses, could be capable of enjoying order ; a way was at least prepared for the restoration of so desirable an event. The truce of the Black Prince was now ended, and he again entered France in the midst of that calm, which had just opened the eyes of the nation to a sense of those scenes of rapine and desolation which had filled the whole kingdom with wretchedness.

He commenced his operations by ravaging and pillaging their country, and levying contributions upon their towns, until desolation itself, compelled him to conclude a peace ; stipulate for the ransom of John II. at three million crowns in gold ; renounce all claims upon Normandy, and the other provinces, claimed or owned by England, in exchange for the provinces of Poictou, Xaintonge, le Angenois, and six others ; together with Guienne and Calais, which were to belong to the crown of England ; and France renounced all feudal claims of homage, &c. King John returned to France ; but when insurmountable obstacles obstructed the execution of this treaty, he broke through his opposing court, repaired to London to negociate for the removal of difficulties, took up his old lodgings, sickened and died, 1364.

CHAP. XVIII.

Particular remarks—affairs of France and Spain—Black Prince renews the war with France—battle of the champions—Germany and Italy.

In the events of the last chapter, we have seen what could be done by a king of England, like Edward III. who knew how to improve to advantage, the powers which his crown derived from the union of the three estates in his government, and what force a well balanced liberty could give to the energies of his sword. We have seen an example of what John II. king of France, or rather the dauphin, in his absence, could not do, for the want of such a free government ; and what the licentiousness of despotism, when transferred from the throne to the populace, did do. Permit me to add we have in our own times witnessed the second volume of the same scenes, arising from the same source, and upon the same theatre of action. The choice is left open to the world.

Charles V. succeeded to the throne of his father, at a period, perhaps, of all others the most difficult ; his resources were so exhausted, that he held but the shadow of power ; the king of Navarre was yet in arms ; forty thousand English adventurers of the sword, had taken possession of the newly acquired provinces, and threatened the peace of the kingdom.

In the midst of this pressing state of things, Peter the I. succeeded to the throne of his father Alphonso XI. king of Spain, and was acting over in Spain, a tragedy, much like the late tragedy in France, in the reign of John II. Count 'Frastamara, brother of Peter, fled into France for safety and succor, and made application to the king. Charles embraced the favorable moment ; met his request, by a permission for count Henry, to enlist those formidable knights of the sword, who had formed themselves into bodies, styled companies, or companions. These readily embraced the offers of Henry, entered into his service under one Du Guesclin, and assembled at Avignon : here they demanded of Pope Innocent VI. (who resided in France during the long feuds of Italy,) absolution from that bull he had thundered against them, and their horrid barbarities ; together with a sum of two hundred thousand livres. Innocent hesitated : to pardon for money, was orthodox ; but to pardon, and pay money, was an alarming innovation—Du Guesclin added ; “ My fellows, I believe, can make a shift to do without your absolution ; but this money is absolutely necessary.” His holiness levied this sum upon the people, and paid the demands of Du Guesclin.

The bandit shrunk from the act, and exclaimed ; “ It is not my purpose to oppress the innocent people : the pope and cardinals can spare me double the sum from their own coffers ; I therefore insist, that this money be restored to the owners ; and if I hear that they are defrauded of it, I will return over the Pyrenees, and oblige you to make them restitution.” Innocent obeyed, and paid the money.

The enterprise in Spain proved successful ; Peter was driven from his throne, fled into France, and took refuge at the court of Edward the black prince, in Guienne. Edward espoused his cause, recalled the English troops under Du Guesclin, put himself at the head of thirty thousand men, entered Spain, met Henry with an army of one hundred thousand men upon the banks of the Ebro, near Najara ; an action commenced, Edward was victorious—twenty thousand French and Spaniards strewed the field of the dead ; Du Guesclin was taken prisoner, and all Castile submitted to Edward, who restored Peter to his throne, and returned to Guienne.

This successful expedition ruined the prince. Peter refused to pay according to stipulation ; the debts of Edward cramped his affairs, and constrained him to levy upon his subjects ; they complained to the king of France ; he cited Edward to appear at Paris, and justify his conduct towards his vassals. Edward obeyed, not the summons of Charles, but of his own resentment ; put himself at the head of his army, and took the field ; war commenced, and raged ; Edward's health declined, and his affairs declined, until he fell a sacrifice to his disease, and with his death, the possessions of England soon returned back to the crown of France, excepting Bordeaux, Bayonne, and Calais.

At this time the gallantries of Edward III. had weakened his government, and rendered it necessary to confer the crown upon his son, the duke of Lancaster. He survived his son one year, and died in the sixty-fifth year of his age, 1377. His name will ever live.

During these struggles in France and Spain, and the long and prosperous reign of Edward III. in England, a furious civil war raged in Germany, to supply the succession, after the interregnum, which followed the death of Henry VII. Frederic, duke of Bavaria, and Lewis, duke of Austria, were the competitors in this controversy. In the midst of this war, two champions agreed to select fifteen from each party, and decide the claims of the competitors by combat. The champions met accordingly near Muldorf, the conflict was in the presence of both armies, and the rencounter so desperate, that every man fell ; not one was spared. Both armies rushed to the combat ; the conflict was terrible ; Frederic was routed, and retired from the field : he soon recovered the blow, and entered Bavaria to take vengeance on his rival ; Lewis appeared with a powerful army, a battle was fought near Vechivis ; Frederic was taken prisoner, his army dispersed, and Lewis bore away the palm, and wore the imperial crown.

During these struggles in Germany, Austria had made one great effort to humble the Swiss : but the famous battle of Morgard defeated the Austrians, and established the liberties of Switzerland.

Lewis V. maintained a controversy with pope John XXII. and marched into Italy, deposed John, and created Nicholas V. Upon his return into Germany, John was restored, Nicholas deposed, carried to Avignon with a rope about his neck, constrained to do penance for his temerity, thrown into prison, and died, 1330.

During this controversy, John died, and Benedict XII. was raised to the chair ; he renewed or confirmed the bulls of John. This, together with a war with the duke of Austria in support of his son, the margrave of Brandenburg, found employment for this year. In the memorable year 1338, the princes of the empire, civil and ecclesiastical, assembled at Frankfort, with a determination to put a final close to the influence of the popes in the councils of Germany, and stop the effusion of blood in these civil wars.

They established irrevocably the following constitution : “ that the plurality of suffrages of the electoral college, confers the empire, without the consent of the holy see ; that the pope has no superiority over the emperor of Germany, nor any right to approve or reject his election ; and that to maintain the contrary is high treason.” They also declared the elector Palatine of the Rhine, to be vested with the government during an interregnum.

During this time, Benedict XII. died, and was succeeded by Clement VI. a native of France, where he then resided. Clement confirmed all the bulls of Benedict and John against Lewis the V. ; but without effect. He then came out with what he considered as his great bull of terror, which was to palsy the power of Lewis, and this was the style : “ May the wrath of God, of St. Peter and St. Paul crush him in this world and the next : may the earth open and swallow him up alive ; may his mercy perish, and all the elements be his enemies ; may his children fall into the hands of his adversaries, even in the sight of their father.”

Clement issued a new bull of election ; it failed in part, but was the means of electing Charles IV. margrave of Moravia, king of the Romans, 1347.

During these struggles with the papacy, Nicholas Rienzi, a private citizen of Rome, by his address, was proclaimed tribune by the people, took possession of the capitol, and declared all Italy free ; he, like the Gracchi of old, fell a sacrifice to his temerity, and was murdered by the patricians.

Charles IV. on his return to Germany, called a new diet at Nuremberg, to fix the imperial elections more definitely, than was expressed by the diet of Frankfort. This diet framed, and published the famous golden bull, which has quieted the elections of the empire to this day. The style of this bull, and the manner in which it was put into operation at the coronation of Charles IV. are worthy of notice ; but such particulars exceed the limits of this work. Charles left the imperial crown to his son Wincleslaus, in 1378.

CHAP. XIX.

Affairs of England under Richard II. and Henry IV.—Scotland—Germany, and the States of Italy—council of Constance.

WE have noticed the successive steps in the government of England to recover her liberties, and the good effects they have produced : we may now notice the distinction between liberty and licentiousness ; mark the contrast, and learn to revere that true system of government which is able to maintain and protect the pure principles of liberty, by the true principles of justice, equity, and sound policy.

When Richard the II. of England. succeeded to the throne of Edward III. his minority was supported by the weight of character and influence of his three uncles, the dukes of Lancaster, York and Gloucester, and the tranquillity of the throne was secured.

The continental wars of Edward, had exhausted his funds, and entailed upon Richard, not only poverty, but the necessity of devising an expedient to replenish his treasury. This might have been effected by a resort to his parliament, after the manner of Edward, but this was overlooked, and he had recourse to a direct tax of three groats upon the head of each person, male and female, over sixteen years of age, called the poll tax. This threw the nation into a ferment, raised the clamour of inequality and injustice, set men to weigh each other in the balance of equality, then of liberty, and led the vassal to say, that if his head was taxed as much as his lord's he was as good as his lord. The passions of the nation were roused ; and a single incident between a tax-gatherer and a young woman, kindled the fire into a flame ; and the nation, as one great mob, flew to arms.

One hundred thousand men invested London, under Wat Tyler their leader, and demanded a conference with the king, who had taken refuge in the tower. A conference was attempted, but the riotous multitude rendered this impracticable ; and they broke into London, gave it up to pillage, and murdered all the gentlemen they could find.

The king again attempted a conference, which was effected ; and they demanded abolition of slavery, free market towns, and a fixed rent on lands, instead of services by villeinage. Those demands would have been instantly granted, but Wat Tyler became so insolent with his sword to the lord mayor, that he struck him to the ground, where he was slain. Great tumults arose, and the mob were about to take instant vengeance upon the lord mayor, the king, and all his attendants. Richard, then sixteen years of age, stepped out in presence of the mob, and exclaimed, "I am your king, and will become your leader ; follow me into the field, and you shall have whatever you want." The mob was hushed, and followed the king, he granted their demands, dismissed them peaceably, and they repaired to their homes.

Thus, we see, how critical is the state of a nation, when balancing between despotism and liberty, how much the good of a government depends upon the wisdom of the prince, and how feudal vassalage was abolished in England.

Richard II. was the sport of faction during his weak reign ; he fell into the hands of the duke of Lancaster, who was making ambitious attempts upon the crown, was exposed to the insult and scorn of the nation, died, and was succeeded by Lancaster, under the title of Henry IV. 1399. Henry, like all other usurpers, laid the foundation of his throne in blood, and paved the way for a religious persecution in England.

Wickliff, the first English reformer, who was educated at Oxford, and from his character and learning, had been thought worthy the society of Edward, when duke of Lancaster, now began to attract attention.

The pure principles of liberty, which Wickliff drew from the gospel, were deemed by Henry, incompatible with the dignity of his crown ; he cherished a bitterness which the clergy harboured against Wickliff, and caused a law to be passed, which consigned to the flames, all relapsed heretics. This, as was intended, opened the way for the persecutions of the faggot ; and William Sauture, a clergyman of London, fell the first victim.

These arbitrary measures, soon involved Henry in wars. An insurrection broke out in Wales, which gave him much trouble; another in Scotland, under Harry Percy, styled Hotspur: this war baffled the efforts of Henry through one campaign, and he returned to England. The next season he entered Scotland with about twelve thousand men; the two armies were equal—they met near Shrewsbury; here commenced one of the most desperate and bloody actions, for the number of combatants, ever witnessed. Henry, and his son, prince of Wales, were engaged with desperate valour; Percy, lord Douglas, and other Scottish chiefs, met the conflict with equal bravery. Hotspur fell, and Edward prevailed; the carnage was terrible, more than two thousand gentlemen fell in the conflict, the rebellion was quelled, and peace was restored without further sacrifice, in 1403.

The battle of Glendour quelled the rebellion in Wales, and Henry was left to the quiet enjoyment of his crown, 1409. This continued four years, when he fell a sacrifice to distressing fits, and died in the forty-sixth year of his age, in 1413.

Winceslaus, whom we left upon the throne of Germany, was soon embroiled in a quarrel between popes Urban VI. and Clement III. who were contesting their claims to the chair, with all the violence and bitterness of Italian wars. The emperor assembled a diet at Nuremberg, who resolved to protect Urban. The plague which raged in Bohemia, led the emperor to repair to Aix-la-Chapelle, where he remained buried in debauchery, while the war of the popes raged in Italy.

This war was heightened by the broils of Joan, ex-queen of Naples, (noticed before in the distresses of that Island,) who fell a sacrifice to the rage of the parties, and left her claims to the crown of Sicily in a labyrinth of controversy, 1393.

Urban triumphed over Clement, took Rome, and Clement retired to France. Urban next seized upon the crown of Naples, and usurped the throne.

At this time, Margaret, queen of Denmark, seized on the kingdom of Sweden, to relieve the Swedes from the tyranny of king Albert; annexed Sweden to Denmark, and acquired the appellation of the Semiramis of the north, 1388. During these struggles, Germany fell into disorder under the reign of the corrupt Winceslaus, who remained at Aix-la-Chapelle, where he caused his cook to be roasted, because he did not please him, and was deposed by the diet of Laenstein, and Frederic, duke of Brunswick, raised to the throne. Frederic was murdered, and Robert, count Palatine of the Rhine, was elected emperor, 1399.

Robert attempted to quiet the wars of Italy by force ; but the campaign was unsuccessful, and the duke of Milan acquired great power in Italy. At this time John Huss appeared in Bohemia, embraced the principles of Wickliff, alarmed the pope, and kindled a fire in the church. Gregory XII. excommunicated Huss, he appealed to the Holy Trinity, and claimed the privilege of making his defence before the university of Prague. The church was now thrown into the greatest confusion.

Two popes were at once in power. Gregory XII. assembled a council at Aquilea, and invited several princes : Benedict XIII. held a council in Catalonia : the cardinals convoked a third at Pisa, and the emperor assembled a diet at Frankfort for the same purpose, and all was division and discord.

To lay the storm, the cardinals deposed both the popes, and raised Alexander V. to the chair ; this added fuel to the fire, and the schism raged afresh. Robert, the emperor, died during this struggle, and Sigismund was raised to the imperial throne, 1411.

Sigismund convoked a general council at Constance, under the sanction of John XXII. who had succeeded pope Alexander V. This was the most numerous, splendid, corrupt council, ever known in Europe.

The first resolve of the fathers was, that the three popes should all resign the chair ; John, who presided, at once complied with this, (provided that the others should consent,) amidst the acclamations of joy in the council ; but this was of short duration, pope John repented, left the council, declared it dissolved by his absence, and fled in disguise, 1415.

CHAP. XX.

Affairs of Germany—of England—of France.

God, in his allwise providence, suffered the papal church to make a full display of all her iniquities in the corruptions which produced the famous council of Constance, to open the way for the great events he was about to unfold for the good of his church. The council, after the departure of pope John, proceeded to determine that no other pope should be chosen without the consent of the council, and to exclude John, Gregory, and Benedict from the chair.

John and Gregory yielded, and resigned; but Benedict stood out, and the emperor Sigismund made a special journey into Spain, attended by twelve deputies from the council to obtain the influence of Ferdinand, king of Arragon, to persuade Benedict to resign: the pope took refuge in the castle of Paniscola, and defeated the embassy.

Ferdinand agreed with the emperor, by his deputies, that the council should cite Benedict to appear at Constance, and upon his refusal, proceed to choose another pope. During the absence of the emperor, the council proceeded to try Jerome of Prague, an associate with John Huss in principles, condemned, and burnt him at the stake! He suffered with great firmness.

Upon the return of the emperor, Benedict was deposed, Martin V. elected, and crowned with great pomp. The emperor, and the elector of Brandenburg, led a most magnificent white horse, on which sat the pope, Martin V.; kings, princes, with their ambassadors, and the fathers of the council, graced the procession to the cathedral, where the triple crown was placed upon the head of his holiness; the same solemnity graced his return.

The Hussites gave loose to their enthusiasm against the opposition of the church, which had excluded them from their communion: they raised a mob, entered the town-house, and murdered all the magistrates who had opposed them. In the midst of these riots, Wincelaud died, and was succeeded in Bohemia, by Sigismund the emperor. This religious war raged with great fury in Bohemia to the year 1436, when Sigismund laid the storm by a general amnesty, granted them the privileges of the sacrament, and they returned to their duty in triumph.

Sigismund led these subjects against the Turks in the year 1347, where he died, and left the crown of Bohemia and Hungary to Albert, duke of Austria, his son in law: this established the house of Austria upon the imperial throne, 1438. This union formed a most important epoch in the history of Europe.

During these feuds in Germany and Italy, Charles VI. had taken possession of his throne of France, when he soon fell into a state of frenzy, which attended him occasionally; and distracted his reign. Nothing worthy of notice appeared in France ; the kingdom was given up to anarchy, licentiousness, and dissipation, in which the court took the lead. The court of Henry IV. of England, kept pace with the court of France, until he died, and left the crown to his son, Henry V. 1413.

The disciples of Wickliff had now become numerous in England, under the denomination of Lollards, and were supported by Sir John Oldcastle, and lord Cobham, noblemen of distinction. The archbishop of Canterbury, alarmed for the safety of the church, obtained the king's permission to suppress the sect of the Lollards, by an attack upon lord Cobham. Henry complied ; the attack commenced, and the persecution raged until Cobham was executed, and the Lollards suppressed. Henry then resolved to take advantage of the distracted state of France, assembled an army of thirty-six thousand men, and landed at Harfleur in France, dismissed his transports, and trusted to the valour of his sword.

Henry was met by a powerful French army of forty thousand men, which checked his progress and compelled him to retire towards Calais. In this retreat, he had occasion to pass the river Somme, under circumstances very similar to the passage of Edward III. The French, here, took post in his rear, upon the plains of Agincourt, and checked his movements : a battle was the only alternative. Henry saw his army, reduced to half their numbers, by fatigues, skirmishing, sickness and hunger, now in the presence of a French army, of four times their numbers, headed by the dauphin, and the best blood of the nation, full fed, and in high spirits. Henry consoled himself with the battles of Cressy and Poitiers, (so famous in English history,) took the same wise measures in posting his army, and awaited the attack. The French, impatient for the victory, advanced to the attack with their usual impetuosity ; the English received the shock with firmness, and charged the French in their turn ; their ranks were broken, thrown into disorder, and put to flight. Henry rushed out of his camp at the head of his guards, and took vengeance on the fugitives, with their battle-axes : a terrible slaughter ensued ; the plain of Agincourt was covered with the wounded, the dead, and the dying. The loss was very inconsiderable to Henry, but ruinous to France. Henry returned to England to recruit his army, and France was torn and distracted with civil war.

The Duke of Burgundy attempted to seize on the crown, and through the extreme corruption of the French court, actually engaged the queen mother, whilst regent to her son, the dauphin, to favor his plans and promote his interest. Charles VI. at this time in a state of frenzy, was secured, the duke of Burgundy entered France with a powerful army, seized the dauphin, and commenced a general butchery of his party and friends, burst open the prisons, and dragged forth to indiscriminate slaughter, all the noblemen he could find.

In the midst of these scenes, Henry returned, and the pope's legate, at a conference, attempted to persuade him to withdraw, and leave the French to their fate, or conclude a peace. Henry urged his claims to the crown, and plead the good he was about to do, in giving law to this distracted nation.

At this time the duke of Burgundy was slain, and the queen settled a treaty with the new duke—agreed that Henry V. should marry the princess Catherine, possess the throne of France as heir apparent, take the government as regent during the life of the king, Charles VI. and support the crown by his arms.

Henry married Catherine the next day—established Charles, his father, at Paris, settled the affairs of the kingdom, lived to see an heir to the throne of France by his queen, sickened at Paris, sent for his principal confidants in England, arranged his affairs, and died, leaving the regency of France to his brother, the duke of Bedford, 1422. Charles VI. the old king died soon, and the dauphin took the throne as Charles VII. and was crowned at Poitiers.

Catherine, the widow of Henry V. married Sir Owen Tudor, a gentleman descended from the ancient princes of Wales, and bore him two sons, who became the earls of Richmond and Pembroke : and who will claim our notice hereafter.

The duke of Bedford exerted himself to support the French crown for the infant heir, Henry VI. and the dauphin, Charles VII. made all possible efforts to recover his claims. Here the parties were at issue. James I. was at this time in prison in England, and the Scots shewed their resentment by supporting with their arms the cause of the dauphin, Charles VII. To obviate this, the English, agreeable to the advice of the regent, the duke of Bedford, entered into alliance with James, and set him at liberty ; but he was soon murdered by his kinsman, the earl of Athol, 1437.

The duke regent overran France, and gained the battle of Vernuil, which appeared to be ruinous to the cause of Charles VII. but by a wonderful train of events, proved ruinous to the cause of the regent, and occasioned the loss of all the English possessions on the continent. The city of Orleans had now become the key of the contending parties, and covered their divided provinces. Charles held possession, and the duke regent resolved to dispossess him ; all Europe considered the fate of the kingdom to depend on the siege of Orleans ; the contending parties exerted all their valor and prowess upon both sides ; Charles VII. began to despair, and actually made arrangements to withdraw into Languedoc and Dauphiny, for the security of his army.

The kind remonstrance of his queen and other favourites at court, diverted Charles from his purpose, and he resolved to defend the city. At this critical moment, a very singular adventure arrested the attention of Europe : Joan De Arc, a country girl of the village of Domrini, on the borders of Lorraine, from a low and obscure station, was raised up as the deliverer of the city of Orleans.

Joan announced that by immediate communications from heaven, she had received a special commission to go, and relieve the city. She went to the governor of the city of Vaucouleurs, and obtained his permission to repair to the court of Charles VII. at Chinon ; there she was favourably received, offered to execute the commission of heaven, and deliver the city : and demanded a particular sword in the church of St. Catherine Fierbois.

After serious and mature deliberation, her request was granted and the sword delivered. Joan, armed cap-a-pie, and mounted on horseback, took her departure at the head of a numerous retinue, and entered the city of Orleans, arrayed in her armour, under the display of her consecrated standard, and amidst the acclamations of the garrison and citizens.

The scene was opened : Joan had promised to raise the siege of Orleans, and cause Charles to be crowned at Rheims : the one was invested, but the other lay in a remote part of the kingdom, guarded by detachments of English troops, in all the passes that led to it.

A general anxiety began to shew itself in the English army, and heaviness had seized their spirits. Joan joined count Dunois the commander of Orleans, and by several desperate and successful sallies, drove the English from their intrenchments, and actually obliged them to raise the siege.

She then pressed Charles to accompany her immediately to Rheims, which he did, at the head of 12,000 men. Their march was rapid and easy; Rheims opened her gates, and Joan and Charles entered in triumph. Charles VII. was crowned, and anointed with that holy oil which the pigeon was said to have brought from heaven to Clovis; and all France was ready to submit to his authority.

This simple story needs no comment—we will pursue the facts in their consequences.

To counterbalance this, the duke regent sent for the young king from England, Henry VI. and had him crowned, and conducted all his movements with the caution of a Fabius, to elude the attack of Charles.

Joan, at the coronation of Charles at Rheims, declared her commission closed, and demanded permission to retire, but was overpersuaded to attempt the defence of the town of Compeign, then besieged by the duke. Here she attempted the same sallies as at Orleans, was taken prisoner, condemned by an ecclesiastical court as a witch and a sorceress, and committed to the flames.

Thus perished the heroine of Orleans, who deserved a better fate, in 1431. The duke regent died soon after—factions sprang up in England, when Henry took the throne; Charles recovered all the English possessions in France, except Calais; the storm of war hushed into a calm, whilst the affairs of England took up the attention of Henry, and the parties withdrew from the contest without even a truce, 1453. France continued to recover her order, and England continued to decline.

We left Albert Duke of Austria upon the imperial throne, where he attempted an expedition against the Turks, but fell a prey to the dysentery 1439, and was succeeded by his brother Frederic III. duke of Austria; Albert's infant son Ladislaus inherited Hungary and Bohemia, under the guardianship of Frederic III. A grand council was now assembled at Basil by order of the council of Constance, "to reform the church universal, both in its head and members." This council had raised to the chair Felix V. in opposition to Eugenius IV. who opposed the meeting of the council.

Frederic III. repaired to this council, after having enjoyed an interview with their pope Felix, who he endeavoured to persuade to resign the chair to Eugenius, and restore peace to the church; Felix resigned, Eugenius died, Nicholas V. was raised to the chair, and the schism was healed.

The healing of this religious faction made Frederic very popular, and opened a new scene. The factions of Germany had for a long time left the states of Italy a prey to their intrigues and civil wars, and the emperor now entered upon a tour of Italy, to heal the contentions, to meet Eleonora, sister to the king of Portugal, to whom he was engaged in marriage, and to receive the Roman crown.

All the cities of Italy vied with each other in testifying their respect for the emperor; ambassadors and deputations, from all the principal cities, met him at the foot of the Alps, courted his attention, and graced his train.

Venice, Milan, Florence, and Bologna, received the emperor with great magnificence, and Sienna witnessed the first interview with the princess Eleonora, where he gave audience to the legates of the Pope.* The emperor had now taken the first step to enter Rome, he next approached the city by the way of Viterbo, (where he was insulted by the populace and his life endangered) and pitched his tent under the walls of Rome, according to custom, and passed the night. The next morning Frederic entered Rome, attended by the whole college of cardinals, amidst the acclamations of the people, and was crowned king of Lombardy; on the third day his marriage with the princess Eleonora was consummated, the concordat of the German Empire ratified with the pope, and the emperor returned to Germany, 1452.

At this time the Turks entered Constantinople in triumph, overthrew the last vestige of the Roman Empire, and put an end to the legs of iron in the great image of Nebuchadnezzar.

Thus far we have traced the progress of man through all the mazes of revolution, in the risé and fall of the four great

* Here Frederic complied with the usages of Emperors before he entered Rome, and took the following oath: "I Frederic king of the Romans, promise and swear by the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, by the wood of the vivifying cross, and by these relics of saints, that if by the permission of the Lord I shall come to Rome, I will exalt the holy Roman church and his holiness who presides over it to the utmost in my power. Neither shall he lose life, limb, or honor by my counsel, consent, or exhortation. Nor will I, in the city of Rome, make any law or decree touching those things that belong to his holiness, or the Romans, without the advice of our most holy Lord Nicholas. Whatever part of St. Peter's patrimony shall fall into our hands, we will restore it to his holiness; and he to whom we shall commit the administration of our kingdom of Italy, shall swear to assist his holiness in defending St. Peter's patrimony to the utmost of his power. So help me God and his holy evangelists."

empires of the earth, distinguished also by the four beasts in the vision of the prophet Daniel ; of whom it was said, “ arise, devour much flesh.” We have also traced the revolutions which have distressed the world under the reign of that little horn, which grew out of the horns of the fourth beast, and seen the plains of ancient Greece, formerly so renowned in the Persian and Roman wars, become the theatre of christian and mahometan conflict.

CHAP. XXI.

Recapitulation—civil wars in England—of France—war in Flanders.

THE feet of the Roman empire are now distinctly formed, as in the great image of Nebuchadnezzar, where the iron is mixed with clay. The beast and the false prophet are now firmly seated in the two great capitals, exercising universal sovereignty. The kingdoms of the west under the dominion of the little horn, will continue to claim our attention.

We have noticed the struggles in France, during the minority of Henry VI. under the regency of his uncle, the duke of Bedford, and the ruin of the affairs of England which followed the death of the duke regent. The character and reign of Henry VI. in England now claim our attention.

The weak reign of Henry, opened the way for Richard, duke of York, to set up his claim to the crown, which he had derived from his mother Phillippa, only daughter of the duke of Clarence, second son of Edward III. ; and who claimed precedence of the title of the duke of Lancaster, who was third son of Edward.

The duke of York had high claims, was valiant, very rich, allied by marriage to the best blood of the nation, and generally beloved.

The queen mother, assisted by the earl of Suffolk, still continued the regency in England, where they were not only unpopular, but accused as the secret cause of all the losses in France ; and as Margaret was a French woman, they were even accused of treachery ; the murder of the duke of Gloucester, which was also imputed to them, confirmed all suspicions, and rendered them odious to the nation.

the duke of York knew how to avail himself of this state of things ; he proceeded to accuse Suffolk in parliament, had him banished for five years, and caused him to be murdered on his passage to France.

The duke of Somerset succeeded in the administration, and in the esteem of the queen ; this transferred the public odium to him ; and the parliament approached the throne with a petition that the duke of Somerset might be excluded from the councils of the nation. Somerset was arrested, sent to the tower, and the duke of York appointed lieutenant of the kingdom, with all the powers of regent.

Henry VI. recovering from the depressed state of his health and spirits, attempted to check the overbearing power of Richard by force. The duke was prepared, and a battle was fought ; Richard was victorious, the king was taken, his army dispersed, and a general accommodation took place between the parties, which was sealed in the public view, by a mutual procession, and te deum, in the cathedral of St. Paul, 1453.

The trifling incident of a quarrel between two servants of the contending parties, again threw the nation into a civil war, and caused the battle of Blow-heath, where again Richard was successful. This increased the violence of the parties, and the jealousy of the nation towards Richard ; the treachery of one of his principal generals, who deserted to the king, obliged Richard to flee to Ireland, and abandon his cause.

In this critical state of affairs, the earl of Warwick appeared in Kent, assembled an army by the influence of his popular talents, marched to London, from thence amidst the triumph of popular applause, he advanced to meet the king. The two armies met at Northampton, an action was fought, Warwick was victorious, the king was taken, and carried in triumph to London.

Richard returned to England, approached parliament with great dignity, modesty and firmness, plead his title to the crown, and retired. The house of peers with the advice of the commons, ratified the claims of Richard, made him regent during the life of Henry, and upon his death, secured the throne, as the true and lawful heir.

Margaret the queen had fled during these struggles, into Scotland, where she raised a powerful army of twenty thousand men, and entered England to dispute the prize.

Richard advanced to meet the queen ; a battle was fought near Wakefield, Richard was slain, and his second son earl of Rutland, taken and murdered : the earl of Salisbury shared the same fate, and opened the way for a war of extermination.

Margaret marched towards London ; the earl of Warwick met her at St. Albans, a battle ensued, Warwick was beaten, and fled to London, and Margaret recovered her captive king.

This victory was checked by the approach of young Edward (then twenty years of age) son of the late duke of York, with a strong force, elated with their late successes. The queen retired to avoid an action ; Edward entered London in triumph, set up his claim to the crown in right of his father, was owned and received by the acclamations of the people, confirmed by the house of lords, and crowned king, as Edward IV.

Here opened the exterminating scene of carnage and destruction in the civil war of the houses of York and Lancaster, (or war of the white and red rose.) The two armies were now augmented to about forty thousand men : they met near Towton, an action commenced, both parties drew the sword and rushed to close combat, the conflict was obstinate, the carnage was great, the Lancastrians fled, Edward pursued, no quarter was the order of the day, and the butchery was awful : thirty-six thousand fell on the field, and in the flight. The action was decisive, and Margaret and Henry fled to Scotland for safety and succor.

The divided state of Scotland, under the reign of James III. (who had succeeded James II.) was in no situation to heal her own factions ; yet she ventured to proffer assistance to Margaret, upon the condition that she should deliver up the conquered fortress of Berwick, and contract her son in marriage with a sister of James III. This being settled, Margaret assembled an army of English, Scots, and French, and advanced into England, 1464.

Lord Montecute met her at Hexham, attacked, routed, and destroyed her army, either in the field or on the scaffold. Margaret and her son fled into a deep forest, where she was robbed by one set of banditti, and protected, with her son, by another, until she found her way into France. Henry was discovered, after one whole year's concealment, carried to London and committed to the tower ; and the tranquillity of the nation was restored.

Edward sent the earl of Warwick into France, to negotiate a treaty of marriage with the sister of the queen of France, and in his absence was smitten with the charms of lady Elizabeth Gray, (whose husband fell in the battle of St. Albans, and whose estate had been confiscated by Richard ;) he offered her his hand, and the half of his crown : was accepted, and the marriage consummated without the privity of Warwick. This raised his irreconcilable revenge : he returned to England, put himself at the head of the Lancastrians, and took the field. Edward, deserted by his friends, felt himself unsafe at the head of his army, and fled into Holland ; Henry VI. was once more restored to the throne, and the parliament declared Edward IV. an usurper, in 1470.

The factions in England opened the way for Edward to return the next year. He entered London in triumph, after having routed the army of Warwick, and seen him and his brother the marquis of Montague, both dead before him, and his army given up to the exterminating cry of no quarter.

Margaret, with her young son, eighteen years of age, landed from France, on the fatal day, and took shelter in the abbey of Beaulieu, where she assembled an army by the assistance of her friends, took the field, and met Edward at Tewksbury. An action ensued ; Margaret was routed, her army cut to pieces and destroyed, she and her son were taken prisoners, her son was murdered, Margaret thrown into the tower, and Edward again restored to the throne.

Having exterminated all his rivals, Edward assembled an army to divert and unite the nation ; embarked for France, and alarmed Lewis XI. into an honourable treaty and returned to England, with seventy-five thousand crowns, and a stipulation for fifty thousand more annually for life, fifty thousand for the ransom of Queen Margaret, who retired to France, and lived and died in peace.

Factions were generally laid now in England, and Edward, after causing the restless spirit of the duke of Clarence to be appeased in a butt of malmsey wine, enjoyed a tranquil throne, and died in the forty second year of his age, 1483.

Edward V. then thirteen years of age, succeeded his father, under the regency of his uncle Richard, duke of Gloucester, who was chosen protector, and who fixed his eye upon the crown.

Between Richard and the throne stood the sons of Edward IV. and two of the duke of Clarence, with their powerful friends. The latter were dispatched in bloody succession, whilst the young princes were snug in the tower ; Richard swam in blood to the throne through the acclamations of the mob, sealed his power by the murder of the princes in the tower, and reigned, the scourge and terror of the nation.

Catherine of France, relict of Henry V. had married sir. Owen Tudor (as was noticed) and left Henry earl of Richmond, who was descended from John duke of Lancaster, son of Edward III. by the side of the mother, and the only branch of the contending family of Lancaster ; the enemies of Richard entered into secret negotiations to restore the throne to the true line, through Henry, under the management of the duke of Buckingham.

Richard, in order to defeat these plans, proposed to marry the princess Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV. and sister of the murdered princes, and actually obtained the consent of the queen mother ; when Henry landed from France with six thousand men, and erected his standard in Wales. The Welch rallied round the standard of a descendant of their ancient kings, and at their head Henry advanced into England. Richard was prepared ; the two armies met at Bosworth, a battle was fought, the conflict was obstinate, Henry was triumphant, Richard fell, and the justice of the sword took vengeance on this monster of cruelty, tyranny, and blood.

Henry was at once crowned king by his army (with the crown Richard wore in the action,) and hailed as the deliverer of the nation ; his title was acknowledged by parliament, he was next married to the princess Elizabeth, and commenced the dynasty of the house of Tudor, under the title of Henry VII.

During these struggles in England, Charles VII. king of France, organized and established his government, secured the possessions acquired from the English, established a regular army, raised a revenue for their regular pay, and established a regular conscription throughout France, of one archer from each village, who was exempt from tax. This laid the foundation in France for the title of gentlemen, both in name and in arms.

In the midst of these wise measures, Lewis XI. rebelled against his father, caused his death, and usurped his throne, 1461. This produced such changes as opened a civil war ; his disaffected nobles flew to arms, and both parties took the field ; they fought, but without decision, and Lewis gained by negotiation what he could not obtain by his sword, and settled the peace of his crown, 1465.

The rapacity of Lewis soon led him into new troubles and entangled him in a quarrel with Charles the Bold, son of Philip duke of Burgundy ; both parties took the field, but Lewis bought off with money, and held a private interview with Charles at Peronne, (then in possession of Charles ;) here Charles caused Lewis to be secured in the castle, and held him as his prisoner, compelled him to march against Liege in support of Charles' claims, and assist in the reduction and ruin of Liege.

Upon the return of his liberty, he attempted to unite to his crown Burgundy, Franche Compte, Artois, Flanders, and almost all the Netherlands, by a marriage between his son Charles the Dauphin (then seven years of age) and the Princess, daughter of the duke of Burgundy, who was sole heiress.

This failed, and the Princess Mary, was married to Maximilian I. son of the Emperor Frederic III. which laid the foundation for all those wars between France and Austria, which desolated the low countries.

Lewis settled a truce in Flanders, but the troubles of France continued to his death, and the horrors of this scene inflicted some punishment on him for the cruelties of his life. Lewis was the first king of France who assumed the title of most christian majesty; he was succeeded by his son Charles VIII. at fourteen years of age, and the regency was conducted by the duke of Orleans, afterwards Lewis XII.

CHAP. XXII.

A general view of Europe ; league of Cambray ; commencement of the Reformation.

THUS having surveyed this dark and distressing period of eleven centuries, we come down to that epoch in the history of Europe, when the reigns of Charles the VIII. of France, Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, Henry VII. of England, Maximilian I. of Germany, and popes Sixtus the IVth, and Alexander VI. formed a new constellation in the western hemisphere, a period when the balance of power first began to be felt and understood ; that balance of power which has been the subject of such distressing and expensive wars, and continues to this day to waste the blood and treasures of Europe.

Charles VIII. was a prince of great ambition, and upon the commencement of his reign found all the great fiefs of France united to the throne, except the duchy of Brittany ; this it became the interest of the nation to unite to the crown by a marriage between Charles and the duchess. After the removal of several important obstacles, this was finally accomplished, and Charles found himself at the head of an undivided throne.

The union of the kingdoms of Castile and Arragon, under Ferdinand and Isabella, was accomplished by a similar marriage in Spain. Under their patronage, Christopher Columbus opened a new world to the family of man in 1492. Henry the VII. by the victory of Bosworth, the death of Richard the III. the last of the Plantagenets, and by the marriage of Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV. quieted the civil wars of England, and restored tranquillity to the throne.

Maximilian I. by creating the high court of the imperial chamber in Germany, quieted in a great measure the feuds which had long distracted the empire, established a union very much like the Achean league in ancient Greece, and secured tranquillity.

Of these popes like all their predecessors, we cannot find one good thing to say, and pass over the many corrupt things we might say, to let them rest in silence.

The system of the balance of power which now began to regulate the great theatre of European politics, took its rise in the Italian claims, and was now confirmed by the expedition of Charles VIII. to support his title to the kingdom of Naples, which he claimed as heir to the house of Anjou.

Charles marched into Italy, took an uncontested possession of the throne of Naples, marched to Rome, took possession as a conqueror, humbled pope Alexander VI. in the castle of St. Angelo, prescribed conditions to the smaller states, and thus gave law to Italy. He caused himself to be proclaimed emperor of the east, upon a grant of Paleologus, when the empire of Constantinople fell into the hands of the Turks. This bold stride of Charles called forth a confederacy composed of the emperor Maximilian I. Ferdinand and Isabella, the Venetians, and the duke of Milan, sanctioned by the pope.

In this union they laid aside their private animosities, formed one common interest, compelled Charles to retrace his steps, return to France, and resign the conquest of Italy in less time than it had taken him to acquire it. His excesses soon closed his life, and he died in 1498, leaving his throne to Lewis XII. ; the fruits of this coalition have been the means of preserving the balance of power, by a similar resort, to this day.

Henry VII. of England made an effort to recover the province of Brittany in the reign of Charles VIII. but was appeased with a large sum of money, and Brittany, together with Burgundy passed into the hands of Lewis XII. then to Francis I. and the kingdom has remained entire. The success of the coalition against Charles VIII. led to a new theatre of events.

The republic of Venice, together with Genoa, became the carriers of Europe in the time of the crusades, which laid the foundation for that commerce which had now raised those cities above all others in Europe, both in wealth, splendor, and the arts. Venice had not only enriched and embellished her city, but enlarged her state by seizing on the dominions of her neighbors, and had become so formidable as to alarm the fears and jealousy of pope Julius II.

Situated at the head of the Gulf of Venice, or Adriatic Sea, she had supplanted the ancient city of Tyre, and engrossed the commerce not only of Europe, but of Asia, and even of Africa; her government which was altogether in the hands of the nobles, had stood unshaken amidst all the storms that surrounded her, and set at defiance the domination of the chair of St. Peter.

Julius formed a coalition to humble her, known by the league of Cambray. The principals of this league were Maximilian I. of Germany, Lewis XII. of France, Ferdinand of Spain, together with the princes of Italy generally. The Venetians suffered this storm to gather and burst upon their heads without one effort to divert it; their long uninterrupted prosperity had corrupted their policy, and lulled them into security.

Overwhelmed by this mighty force, they abandoned all their conquests, shut themselves up in their city, and sued for peace. Julius, who was at the head of this league, and who had thrown his keys into the Tiber, drawn his sword to assert his dominion and become a champion of Mars, seized on and recovered such territory as lay within, and contiguous to ecclesiastical estates, and settled a peace.

Alarmed at the formidable force of Lewis, as well as the rest of the allies, Julius absolved the Venetians from his spiritual thunders, united them in his interest to expel all foreigners out of Italy, and drew his sword upon Lewis. Julius diverted Ferdinand from the league, united the Swiss in his interest, and solicited and obtained the aid of Henry VIII. of England, who co-operated in the war.

The battle of Ravenna lost Lewis all his claims in Italy, and his flight was as rapid as the flight of his predecessor Charles VIII. Julius succeeded in all his plans and died at an advanced age, leaving the chair to Leo X. 1513.

Henry VIII. followed up the blow, formed a league with Maximilian, and the two sovereigns took the field in Flanders against Lewis XII. where the emperor Maximilian served in the pay and under the command of Henry VIII. of England.

Here commenced the English and German coalitions in Flanders against France. Henry was entangled in a war with Scotland, and Lewis with pope Leo X. at the same time. The war in Elanders became a war of posts; the campaign closed without advantage to the parties, Henry returned to England, a peace was settled generally by intermarriages the next season, and the storm of war was again hushed.

Lewis died 1515, and was succeeded by his son-in-law, Francis I.; the next year died Ferdinand of Spain, who was succeeded by his grandson Charles, heir to the archduke Philip, sovereign of the low countries, who also was elected emperor of Germany, upon the death of Maximilian, under the title of Charles V. 1519.

Amidst this bright constellation of princes, upon the thrones of England, France, Spain and Germany, appeared Martin Luther, the angel of the gospel, and the champion of the reformation. At this period the use of letters, under the art of printing, the use of gunpowder in the art of war, the use of the mariner's compass in the art of navigation, the improvements of husbandry, manufactures, and commerce, together with the discovery of a new world, commenced a new era in the annals of man, opened a new field for the display of talents, enterprise and ambition; gave to the religion of the gospel a triumph over the bigotry, idolatrous superstition and corruption of popery, and opened the way for the establishment of a purer church in Europe, and in this western wilderness.

CHAP. XXIII.

General state of society, commerce, navigation, and the arts in Europe—foreign adventures and discoveries—reformation continued.

BEFORE we enter upon that all-important scene, the reformation under Martin Luther, let us take a view of commerce, navigation, the arts, and state of society generally, at this eventful age.

Portugal which had been erected into a kingdom by duke Alphonso Henriquez, 1139 ; was torn by feuds, and distracted by perpetual wars with the Moors, until the reign of king John, 1385. He, like Alfred of England, turned the attention of the nation to their fleet. His successor, Don Henry, enlarged and improved the plans of his father, cultivated the sciences with great success, applied the science of astronomy to the art of navigation, and taught the Portuguese how to explore distant lands, who by their successful efforts were inspired with a spirit for distant adventure. The same spirit grew and increased under the succeeding reign of John II. who transmitted it to his successor, Emanuel I.

At the commencement of his reign, he found that the whole coast of Africa, upon the shore of the Atlantic had been explored by his predecessor, as far as the Cape of Good Hope ; the Azores and Cape de Verd Islands were opened to their view, and the vine and sugar cane were introduced into Madeira with success.

Emanuel, alive to the spirit and successes of national enterprize, sent a fleet of four ships under Vasco de Gama, to explore the Indian Ocean, who discovered Hindostan, or hither India, 1498, touched at the city of Calicut, on the Malibar coast, then greatly enriched by the trade of the Arabs, who were the carriers of the wealth of India, by the way of the Red Sea to Egypt, or by the way of Palmyra to Tyre and Sidon ; from whence the Venetians and Genoese conveyed it to Europe.

De Gama, after a perilous but successful voyage, returned to Lisbon, and thus laid the foundation of the commerce of India, by the way of the Cape of Good Hope. Pope Alexander VI. granted to Emanuel all his new discoveries, and all such as he should discover, provided he should propagate the christian religion.

Fired with zeal and enterprize, in commerce, and religion, the whole nation caught the flame ; and on a second adventure with thirteen ships, under Alvarez de Cabral, they traversed the great Atlantic, explored the coast of Brazil, on the continent of South America, in 1500, took possession under the title of the land of the holy cross, pursued their voyage by the way of the Cape of Good Hope to India, established with the sword an independent trade, and returned to Lisbon.

A strong force was sent out in 1502, which confirmed the former establishment in India, burnt Calicut, and made Goa, the emporium of Portuguese commerce in India. In 1511, Albuquerque, the Portuguese governor of India, took the city of Malacca. He ruined the commerce of Egypt with India, by his depredations on the shores of the Red Sea, and thus turned the wealth of India to Lisbon.

Albuquerque, after all these services for his country and the world, like his great prototype, Christopher Columbus, fell a sacrifice to the envy and malice of his enemies, and died of a broken heart, in poverty and disgrace.

The Portuguese afterwards extended their commerce to China and Japan. The discoveries of Christopher Columbus, 1492, we will reserve for the history of America.—The English, the Spaniards, and the Dutch, were soon engaged in the commerce of the east; and all that wealth which used to pass into the west, by the way of the Persian gulf, to Tyre and the Red Sea, to Cairo and Alexandria, and from thence, by the ships of Venice and Genoa, to Flanders in the low countries, and Dantzic and other ports on the Baltic, and thence generally diffused over Europe—was at this time brought to Lisbon, by the way of the Cape of Good Hope, which continues to this day the highway of the commerce of the west with the east.

Martin Luther commenced his labors in the heart of Germany, of unfolding to the world the mystery of iniquity which had for so many centuries been veiled in the mysteries of popery, by publishing the pure doctrines of the gospel in a language familiar to all, and disclosing the corruptions of the beast without morals, without religion, and without the authority of God.

France and Spain were now engrossed in the strife between Charles V. and Francis I. for supremacy in Italy. Henry VIII. of England was engaged in holding a balance of power between them, whilst Luther was in the heart of Germany, publishing good tidings of good things.

He was opposed by pope Clement VII. who summoned a diet at Worms to check the progress of Luther, who had converted to the faith nearly one half of Germany, and gained the confidence of a great part of the remainder. The edicts of the diet of Worms, and the spiritual thunders of Clement, were lost in the air; Luther set them at defiance.

Charles V. alarmed for the safety of the church, and the peace of Germany, assembled the diet of Spires to take into consideration the state of religion ; they confirmed the edicts of Worms ; this called forth the protest of the elector of Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, the duke of Lurenburg, the prince of Anhalt, with the deputation of fourteen free imperial cities, against the edict of Spires, and fixed to the followers of Luther the name of protestants, which continues to this day.

Melancthon, who co-operated with Luther, drew up a system of principles, styled the confession of Augsburg, which became the strong hold of attack and defence through this wonderful contest ; resisted the sword, the torch and the gibbet, with all the malice of hellish assassination ; stood the palladium of the reformation, triumphed over the beast with his ten horns, and has transmitted the blessings of " peace on earth and good will to men," down to the present period.

The field of foreign enterprise led off the attention of the maritime states in the south of Europe, and the great contest in Italy between Charles V. and Francis I. (in which Francis failed, and was led a prisoner from the siege of Pavia into Spain,) also served to divert the attention of these powers, and open the way for the more easy spread of the reformation—and the effects of these very struggles, and this commerce, were, to expand the minds of men, and facilitate the easy and general circulation of the scriptures of truth.

Henry VIII. of England, with a steady eye to the balance of power in Europe, effected the restoration of Francis I. after a captivity of two years, entered into the religious quarrels of the day, and by his defence of popery, obtained from the pope the title of defender of the faith : but when his holiness refused to sanction the divorce of his wife, he threw off the mask, severed his kingdom of England from the holy see, founded the reformed protestant episcopal church, by a decree of his parliament, placed himself at its head, and at one bold stroke abolished all the religious cloisters of England—thus rooting out popery, by the destruction of these sinks of corruption, together with the influence of the monks, those pests and drones of society, who governed them.

Henry proceeded to divorce his first wife, Catherine of Spain, and in succession married five others ; of these, two were divorced, two beheaded, and two died natural deaths.

Henry was no Lutheran, and so full was he of the ideas of heretics, that he denounced all who questioned his supremacy, and brought to the block all who advocated the doctrines of Luther. The six articles (called the bloody bill) which Henry forced through his parliament, proved him to be yet an orthodox catholic; the observance of these articles he enforced with the punishment of death.

Henry VIII. went very far however to promote the reformation in England; though he was as bloody an enthusiast and tyrant, as many of the popes of Rome, and died as he had lived, a catholic.

CHAP. XXIV.

Affairs of Germany—England—France—massacre of St. Bartholomew.

THE confession of Augsburg, and the league of Smalkalde, which united the faith and energies of the protestants in Germany, maintained a firm resistance to the powers of the emperor and the pope, until they were broken by the civil wars, and the reduction of Saxony. This stroke gave strength and confidence to the emperor; he convoked the diet of Augsburg, and published his interim.

This placed Charles between two fires, excited the indignation of the pope, and his despotic sway, united more firmly the protestant league of Smalkalde, and brought in prince Maurice, who had subdued Saxony for the emperor, to oppose Charles, and support the protestant league. In the midst of these scenes, died Clement VII. and Francis I. who were succeeded by Paul III. and Henry II.

This change of measures in Maurice, humbled the haughty plans of Charles, and fixed the reformation upon an immovable basis in Germany.

In the midst of these troubles, and immediately after the league of Smalkalde, died Martin Luther; having kindled the reformation, and having lived to realize that waters could not quench, and that floods could not drown it; but that a way was already prepared for it to illuminate the world.

Thus we have seen how the prediction of the prophet has been fulfilled in this angel of the gospel; and every protestant divine from that day to this, has added one more blast to the trump of the immortal Luther ; and all who shall follow, will continue to swell the blast, till the commencement of the millennial day.

In the midst of the triumphs of the reformation in Germany died Henry VIII. of England, who was succeeded by his only son, Edward VI. at nine years of age. Henry settled his crown by will ; first upon Edward, (by Jane Seymour :) then to Mary, (by Catherine of Arragon ;) then to Elizabeth, (by Anne Bolyn.) During the minority of Edward, the regency devolved upon his uncle, the Duke of Somerset, with the title of protector, together with five other executors, with archbishop Cranmer at their head. Under this protectorate, a war sprang up between England and Scotland, which led the Scots to send the young princess Mary into France for her education. It produced no decisive events, and closed with the triumph of the reformation in England, and the establishment of the church and Liturgy, as they now stand at this day.

The intrigues of the earl of Northumberland, which brought to the block the regent and protector, and upon the death of Edward VI. conferred the throne upon Lady Jane Gray, to the exclusion of the heir named in Henry's will—the arm of justice, supported by the voice of the nation, which set aside lady Jane Gray, brought the earl of Northumberland to the block, and placed the crown upon Mary, the rightful heir—we shall pass over ; together with the bloody reign of queen Mary, in which she attempted to restore the Catholic religion, with the union and sovereignty of the holy see, at the expense of the best blood of the nation.

In this bloody reign, a John Rogers, a Latimer, a Cranmer, and other worthies of the protestant church, fell a sacrifice. An insurrection to resist these sanguinary scenes, and restore lady Jane Gray and her husband, lord Dudley, to the throne, brought these worthies to the block, together with many who abetted their cause ; popery swam in blood $\frac{1}{2}$ years, when the nation was relieved by the death of Mary, and the accession of the illustrious Elizabeth, 1558.

In the same year, Charles V. at the age of fifty-six, bestowed his crown and sceptre upon his son Philip II. king of Spain, and husband of Mary queen of England—that he might pass the remainder of his days in retirement and private life ; he left the reformation triumphant in Germany, part of Switzerland, in England and Scotland, with favourable prospects in France and Ireland.

One of the first steps of Elizabeth was, to extend the arm of protection to the protestants in Scotland, already worn down by a popish persecution, during the regency of queen Mary, instigated and supported by the intrigues of France, under the influence of her husband, Francis II. who had succeeded Henry II. The reformation, after a severe and desperate struggle, triumphed over all opposition in Scotland, by the assistance of queen Elizabeth, and established there the protestant presbyterian church, as enjoyed at this day.

The death of Francis II. at this time, left the queen of Scots without issue, guaranteed to the protestants of Scotland the enjoyment of their religion, and to Elizabeth the tranquillity of her throne.

Charles IX. succeeded to the throne at ten years of age, and the kingdom fell under the regency of the queen mother; the king of Navarre was named lieutenant general of France. At this time the reformation had taken deep root in France; and the catholics and protestants were so nearly balanced, that some degree of toleration became necessary on the part of the crown to appease the violence of party. An edict was accordingly published, allowing to protestants the free enjoyment of their religion, without the walls of cities. This edict led to a civil war, in which Philip II. of Spain engaged in the bitterness of his heart against the protestants; and Elizabeth of England, that champion of the reformation, in their support. The protestants after a severe struggle, were successful, and obtained a further guarantee of their privileges.

Upon the return of Mary, from France to Scotland, after the death of her husband, Francis II. king of France, she carried with her all the elegance and splendor of her person, polished by a French education, and the principles and bigotry of the catholic religion; this, notwithstanding all her efforts to prevent it, poisoned the nation, and embittered her life, by alienating the affections of her people, exciting their jealousy and distrust, and inflaming the protestants to open acts of disrespect, insult, violence and rebellion.

This rebellion in Scotland led Mary to France for counsel and support, where the reformation was denounced, and a total overthrow upon the continent, especially in France, Spain, and the low countries, concerted at Bayonne by the holy or catholic league. When Mary became acquainted with this, she determined to co-operate in Scotland, and suppress the rebellious protestants by severity, even to extermination.

In the midst of these scenes of distress in the nation, Mary married lord Darnley, against the will of the protestants ; by him she had a son, James VI. : soon after this event, Darnley died, by an explosion of gun powder. The flames of discord, by the imprudencies of Mary, were again kindled into a civil war ; and Mary was constrained to flee into England, place herself under the protection of her sister Elizabeth, where by an order of Elizabeth, she was confined, and languished in her prison, a subject of intrigue.

During her confinement, Scotland was torn by the conflicting interests of the catholics and protestants ; France became again the theatre of a religious civil war ; and the low countries were drenched in blood, to enforce the catholic league, and exterminate the hugunots or protestants. The illustrious queen Elizabeth, high raised on the protestant throne of England, sat clothed in majesty, and held the balances. Again, under her auspicious influence, the protestants triumphed in France, and by a favorable peace, secured the enjoyment of their principles.

The queen of Scots, during her confinement, had recourse to Charles IX. of France, and Philip II. of Spain ; but the distracted state of their own dominions, left them no leisure to attend to her unhappy cause. The persecutions in the low countries, under the duke of Alva, a blood thirsty bigot of Philip II. drove the seven provinces of Holland to unite in their own defence, raise the standard of rebellion, and assert their independence of the crown of Spain. This opened a severe and bloody contest : they applied to Elizabeth for aid ; again she held the balances, severed the low countries from Spain, and established their independence. Elizabeth also put an end to the catholic persecutions in Scotland, by giving up Mary to the executioner ; when the protestants triumphed in Scotland.

Not so in France ; the catholic league filled the heart of Charles IX. ; he affected to form a union with the catholics and protestants, by giving his sister in marriage to the young king of Navarre, and upon the grand celebration of the nuptials in Paris, where the protestants resorted upon the occasion, from all parts of France, he ordered a general massacre to commence and extend throughout the kingdom. More than seventy thousand protestants of every age, sex, and condition throughout France, fell a sacrifice to this bloody edict. Amidst the horrors of this distressing scene, the catholics were filled with rejoicings for the triumphs of the church militant upon the massacre of St. Bartholomew. In the midst of these scenes, Charles died at twenty-four years of age, of a horrible disease, and was succeeded by Henry III. 1574.

CHAP. XXV.

Affairs of the Reformation generally—Spanish Armada.

THESE conflicts of the reformation in the west of Europe gave an entire change to the affairs of Christendom, and produced new scenes and new theatres of action; the spirit of commercial enterprise, also gave a new spring to the mind of man.

The emperor Ferdinand, who succeeded Charles V. 1557, made one grand effort to unite the discords of religion in Germany, by the council of Trent, 1561, which offered a degree of toleration upon the plan of the interim of Charles V. and was in like manner rejected by both parties; the council was dissolved 1563, Ferdinand died 1564, and was succeeded by Maximilian II.

The ambition of Selim II. Sultan of Constantinople, in his wars with the Venetians, and upon Hungary, gave full employment to the reign of Maximilian. The massacre of St. Bartholomew filled Europe with horror, and France with revenge. The barbarous and sanguinary principles of popery greatly promoted the protestant cause, raised a civil war; and Henry III. put himself at the head of the protestants.

In the midst of these scenes, Philip II. king of Spain, greatly enriched by commerce and the mines of Mexico and Peru, and highly incensed against queen Elizabeth, as the protector of the protestants, prepared for the invasion of England, with the most formidable fleet then ever known, styled the invincible armada; to tear from Elizabeth the balances of Europe, hurl her from her throne, and, like William of Normandy, wield the sceptre of England, and restore the rights of the holy see.

The armada put to sea, and appeared off the coast of England, threw the nation into a state of consternation, and called forth all the majesty and energies of Elizabeth, who by a special act of heaven, was soon relieved from her alarm. A violent tempest arose, which overwhelmed the armada, dispersed and dashed the ships against the rocks, and left the fugitives an easy prey to the ships of Elizabeth, and at a blow her throne was secured ; which called forth from the queen this memorable expression—"Deus flavit dissipantur." (God blew and they are scattered.) Elizabeth at the same time narrowly escaped from the blackest conspiracy, under Babbington.

Henry the III. of France, at the head of the protestants, at the same time laid siege to his capital, then in the power of the catholics, where he was assassinated by a Dominican friar, and left his crown to the king of Navarre, Henry IV. (first of the Bourbons,) who pressed by the catholic league, had recourse to Elizabeth. She sent him aid, by the means of which he held the catholics at bay ; and in order to secure the tranquillity of his kingdom, embraced the catholic religion, and published the famous edict of Nantz, which guaranteed to the protestants the quiet enjoyment of their religion. Thus Henry restored peace to his throne, in the midst of jealousy, gave tranquillity to France and settled a peace with Philip of Spain, 1598.

At this time died Philip II. The war still raged with violence in the low countries, which was closed by a truce for twelve years, between Philip III. and the United Provinces, 1609. At the same time Philip caused the Moors to be expelled from Spain, (more than one million of hardy, industrious inhabitants :) this, together with the loss of the armada, and the seven united provinces, with the pride and indolence arising from the great influx of wealth from Mexico and Peru, and the degrading effects of the inquisition upon the mind of man, humbled the pride of Spain, and placed her in a degraded situation, from which she has never risen.

Immediately after the death of Philip II. died queen Elizabeth, 1601, and left her throne to James VI. of Scotland, son of Mary, whom she had beheaded in England. James united the kingdoms of England and Scotland ; and was the first king of Britain under the title of James I.

The reign of queen Elizabeth is above all comment ; it stands unrivalled in the annals of England, and of the world, and opened the way for all that is valuable to the protestant cause.

Henry IV. succeeded to a throne greatly impoverished, and almost ruined by the religious civil wars in France; but his energy, talents, and ambition fitted him to fill it to advantage: he quieted the feuds of France and made one great effort to quiet the feuds of the continent, by his plan of one great confederated republic, with France at its head.

To effect this, he encouraged and promoted the protestant cause in Germany, and the low countries, but in the midst of his visionary plans, he fell a sacrifice to the dagger of a monk, in the streets of Paris, 1610, and was succeeded by Lewis XIII. then a minor.

France, under the regency of the queen mother, fell again into all the scenes of discord and civil war; and the continent was now torn with the conflicts of the two great parties, known by the names of the evangelical union, and the catholic league.

Germany in particular was one continued scene of civil war; at the same time it was entangled in the wars of the Franks, through the reigns of Rodolph II. and Matthias, down to the death of Philip III. of Spain, in 1624, who held his share in these feuds, to augment his power in Italy.

The United Provinces, notwithstanding they were torn with severe religious feuds amongst the protestants themselves, immediately after the pacification of 1609 had now greatly extended their commerce in the east, taken Brazil in the west, and were the immediate commercial rivals of all the maritime states of Europe.

France and Germany having long been distracted with religious feuds, the parties prepared to settle all their disputes with the sword, upon the great theatre of Germany.

A marriage took place at this time, between Charles I. then prince of Wales, and Henrietta, sister of Lewis XIII. of France, which produced the same consequences in England, as the marriage of Mary queen of Scots, with Francis II. of France, had done in Scotland.

The war between the protestant union, and the catholic league commenced about 1610, became general throughout Europe, called into action all the great talents of Europe, and was the first general display of arms in Germany.

Upon this grand theatre of action, flourished the great Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, in support of evangelic union, and crowned with his death, the famous victory of Lutzen.

This triumph of Lutzen, was the triumph of the reformation ; and the treaty of Prague, 1635, guaranteed to the union, from the court of Vienna, all the claims of the champions of the reformation : but the war still raged with France until the death of Lewis XIII. 1643, then under Lewis XIV. until the peace of Westphalia, 1648. This again confirmed to the union all former treaties, and gave them an uninterrupted enjoyment of their religion, together with an equal share in the grand councils of Germany, and broke the power of the catholic league.

CHAP. XXVI.

Reformation continued—Great Britain under James I. and Charles I.

UPON the death of queen Elizabeth, we found James the I. son of the unfortunate Mary queen of Scots, as the rightful heir ; and agreeable to the wishes of Elizabeth, and the two nations, upon the throne of England. James I. was great grandson of Margaret, eldest daughter of Henry VII. ; and upon the failure of the male line in the house of Tudor, he was the true heir, and commenced the dynasty of the house of Stuart : the change was easy and regular.

James was courted by all the potentates of Europe, and after the defeat of the conspiracy in favour of his cousin, Arabella Stuart, enjoyed a tranquil throne, gave his whole attention to the sciences ; by his writings, he proved the pope to be antichrist, and modern Rome the whore of Babylon.

Emboldened with confidence at these public sentiments of the king, the sect of puritans, which had now greatly increased in England, ventured to approach the throne, with hopes of obtaining the abolition of episcopacy. This bold step alarmed the king, and he returned this steady reply ; “ no bishop, no king.”

The puritans were ordered to conform. James declared himself the husband of one wife, destroyed the barriers of the frontier towns, and brought the two kingdoms together. These popular measures of James, did not satisfy the puritans, nor the catholics, and the latter consented to the diabolical scheme of destroying both king and parliament at a blow, by a gunpowder plot, in 1605.

Upon the detection of this plot, a vast quantity of gunpowder in barrels, was found concealed under the house of lords, the day before the session of parliament, with one Fawkes, (a Fleming,) placed as the centinel and executioner, with his matches ready prepared. In this affair were involved many catholics of the first distinction ; whose conviction and execution, spilt some of the best blood of the nation. The detection of this plot, and the lenity of James, secured his popularity, and absolved him from all suspicions of popery during his reign.

James made great efforts to civilize the English, Scotch, and particularly the Irish ; and took more delight in the arts of peace, than of war : by his weakness, he distracted his reign, in bestowing unmerited favors upon undeserving favorites. To support these, he offended the nation, by selling to the Dutch the cautionary towns, pledged to queen Elizabeth when she granted them support in their revolutionary struggle.

James' next unpopular step was, to attempt to establish a uniformity of worship in Scotland, as well as England, together with church discipline ; for this purpose he visited his native country.

The nobility of Scotland were attached to the government of James, the people were under a certain degree of feudal vassalage, and of course slaves ; but the kirk, or religion of Scotland, was free, independent, and of the presbyterian order. This order existed at this time in Switzerland, upon the plan of Zuinglius, and John Calvin, the great apostles of Switzerland.

The first unpopular stroke of James in Scotland was, to permit certain catholic lords, who had been banished Scotland, to return to the kingdom. This lit up a fire, he never could extinguish, and raised an insurrection which placed James at the mercy of a mob in Edinburgh. This occasioned a convention of the states of Scotland, where James obtained an acknowledgement of his supremacy over the ecclesistical affairs of Scotland, and the power of settling the forms of worship and church discipline, with the consent of the archbishops, bishops, and a competent number of ministers.

This dangerous power was opposed by his parliament, and relinquished by James : but the next year he introduced some ceremonies, by the consent of the kirk. This kindled the fire in Scotland ; and the execution of Sir Walter Raleigh, the projector of the colonies in North America, stamped an odium upon the reign of James which followed him to his grave.

In addition to this, the match he was planning for his son Charles, the prince of Wales, with the Infanta of Spain, roused the feelings and resentment of the nation, brought on a collision between James and his parliament, and opened the controversy of privilege and prerogative, which had for its object to destroy the true balance of power in the government, by throwing too great a weight into the scale of monarchy, under the claim of prerogative, or too great a weight into the scale of democracy, under the claim of privilege.

The Spanish match, after a most courteous interview of Charles in Spain, with the Infanta, was closed by intrigues, which produced a war between England and Spain, and an alliance was formed between Charles and the princess Henrietta of France. Charles succeeded to the throne upon the death of his father, 1625. The attempts of James to lord it over the forms of religion in Scotland and England, drove from his kingdom that little band of puritans, with their pious minister the Rev. John Robinson, who fled to Holland, and who will become the subject of notice in the American narrative.

The duke of Buckingham, who had accompanied Charles to Spain, and had been the instrument of breaking off the Spanish match, had thereby become very popular with the parliament. This increased the insolence of Buckingham, until he ruined Charles and himself, in the esteem of the nation, and paid for his folly and temerity by the knife of the assassin. Charles endeavoured to save himself, but it was now too late ; the war of prerogative and privilege, between Charles and his parliament, had gone too far. Charles tried the expedient of dissolving his parliament ; but this only fanned the fire ; the war against France in support of the Hugunots, had done the same, and even the fall of the obnoxious Buckingham had given no relief. The passions of the parties had surmounted their understandings, and what was best for the nation, was now involved in the point, who should rule. The queen who was a catholic, and archbishop Laud, who was a haughty, violent prelate, had both great influence with Charles; strengthened his obstinate resolutions, and fixed his fate.

A specimen of the religious principles, which were the basis of all this national struggle, may be seen in the consecration of the church of St. Catherine, near the borders of Scotland. Archbishop Laud marched in procession with great pomp and solemnity, to perform the holy office of consecration. When he approached the church, a loud voice exclaimed, "Open! open! ye everlasting doors! and let the king of glory in"—the doors flew open, the archbishop entered—fell on his knees, and exclaimed with extended arms, and uplifted eyes, "this place is holy, the ground is holy; in the name of the father, son, and holy ghost, I pronounce it holy." He approached the communion table, and bowed frequently towards it; then marched in procession round the church, repeating the 100th psalm; then said a form of prayer, concluding with these words: "We consecrate this church, and separate it unto thee as holy ground, not to be profaned any more to common uses;" uttering imprecations on all who should profane that sanctuary, bowing towards the east upon every imprecation, and exclaiming "Let all the people say amen." He then pronounced benedictions on all who should nurse, and enrich that church by their temporal gifts; and upon every benediction bowing towards the east, exclaimed: "Let all the people say amen." Such were the counsellors, and such the religion, which distracted the nation, under the externals of privilege and prerogative.

In this state of things, a change of ministry, even under a privilege administration, produced no change in the public feeling. The same measures distracted both England and Scotland; the jurisdiction of Presbyteries, Synods, and other democratic courts, was abolished, and the general assembly had fallen into neglect for more than two years; all this kindled the fire in the kirk of Scotland, and an attempt was made to revive the college of justice, between the clergy and laity, as before the reformation. All classes of people took the alarm, and popery, was the general cry.

When the dean of Edinburgh attempted to introduce the liturgy into the cathedral of St. Giles, arrayed in his surplice—"a pope! a pope!" vociferated from all parts of the church; and the tumult was so great as to require the interposition of civil authority to protect the service. All these arts, led the Scots to unite in a solemn covenant, to resist the usurpations of the crown, and protect the kirk.

This coalition of power, proved a barrier to the encroachments of Charles, called forth the best talents of the nation, and opened a civil war. The parliament of England co-operated with the covenanters, and their vengeance fell first on the minister of Charles, the earl of Strafford; who, after the most masterly and dignified defence, was convicted of treason; and in spite of all the efforts of Charles to save him, brought to the block.

This sacrifice produced a momentary suspension of the evils; but the fire soon began to rage, both in England, Scotland and Ireland, and produced from the English parliament the famous remonstrance, which was an appeal to the people, although addressed to the king; and was fully a manifesto, and a signal for the last extremity. The violence of the parties increased daily; excess followed excess, and violence and extreme succeeded violence and extreme, until privilege swallowed up prerogative, the voice of the king was lost in the usurpations of parliament, a civil war raged, the king was overpowered and obliged to flee, archbishop Laud was accused of high treason, and brought to the block, the king was taken, brought to London, imprisoned, tried, and executed. His death laid the foundation of the commonwealth, under the protectorate of Oliver Cromwell.

CHAP. XXVII.

Great-Britain under Oliver Cromwell—Charles II.—France under Louis XIV.

DURING the reign of Charles I. the civil and religious liberty of the nation engrossed their whole attention; their agriculture and commerce were neglected; their foreign possessions languished; the Dutch seized on some of their most valuable spice islands; and the affairs of the nation were low. The triumph of liberty over tyranny, and the fall of the tyrant, opened the way for Oliver Cromwell, as the popular chief, to usurp the throne and give law to the nation, under the title of Lord High Protector. Under this title Cromwell ruled with imperial sway; but the house of lords had been abolished, and such was the spirit of liberty under the commonwealth, that Cromwell with all his efforts and popularity could not restore it. Under this government they chastised their haughty, insolent, avaricious neighbours the Dutch, in several desperate, bloody, and decisive naval combats, extended their commerce, improved their agriculture, cultivated the arts, sciences and manufactures, and opened the way for the restoration of the monarchy under the splendid reign of Charles II.

Charles succeeded to the throne through the artful policy of general Monk, who relieved the nation from the feeble, imbecile reign of Richard, son of Oliver Cromwell, whose talents were far below the ambition of the nation, and who reigned only seven months. Charles II. more intent on his own pleasures, and the gratifications of his courtiers, than the good of his people, suffered the commerce of the nation again to decline, and the Dutch to rival them in India.

The efforts to settle North America were successful, and a foundation was laid in this reign, for the succeeding prosperous enterprise of the nation in the new world.

That spirit of the reformation which had resisted the violent measures of Charles I. and flourished so conspicuously under the commonwealth, was in its full strength in Scotland, at the accession of Charles II. and displayed its zeal and enthusiasm, in large and frequent religious assemblies in the open field, called conventicles.

That liberty which always accompanies such zeal, Charles considered as incompatible with the dignity of his crown, and sent the earl of Lauderdale to check and suppress it. Again the spirit of the reformation was called to assert its liberties against the violent measures of the crown; but not with the same success. The power of the crown prevailed, and through the extremes of violence, cruelty and severity, the spirits of the enthusiasts were humbled. If such things could be done in the green tree, what could not be done in the dry: if a protestant administration could be guilty of such severity and cruelty, what might not be expected from popery.

Whilst the nation were shocked with the severities of Charles, and distresses of Scotland, they were roused, as by a clap of thunder, by the alarm of the popish plot. This, whether a reality, or an artful finesse, is still doubtful: but at that time, as a serious reality, it excited strong apprehensions, and threw the nation into the highest state of alarm; opened again the sharpest conflict between the king and his parliament; excited the same feelings in the nation as in the reign of Charles I. and nothing but the conciliatory address, and high popularity of the king could have prevented another civil war.

The intrigues of France at this time, had a powerful influence in the court of Charles; he made the most of it, and by a money compact with the cabinet of Lewis XIV. became independent of his parliament, assumed a dictatorial style, set them at defiance, humbled their refractory spirit, and triumphed in their submission.

The doctrine of passive obedience, and non-resistance, became the order of the day, and was echoed from the desk and the bar through the nation. Charles enjoyed his successes in triumph, deprived the city of London of its charter; the other cities tendered a voluntary resignation of theirs, and sealed the independence of the crown.

These measures excited the passions and indignation of the sons of liberty, and roused the resentment of the Ryehouse plot, (so called,) a plot destined to restore the commonwealth by another revolution. This was discovered, and suppressed by some of the best blood of the nation, and laid the foundation of that permanent strength in the monarchy, which alone has supported it through all the successive struggles of the crown, and enabled it to triumph over that disorganizing spirit of liberty, which became so factious in the time of the French revolution.

It placed in the power of the crown, (or of the minister,) the control of the borough elections, which constitute three-fourths of the members of parliament, and thereby has, to this day, given the minister the control of that branch of the government, and rendered the crown in a sense despotic. Charles disclosed all the religion he had at his death, in partaking of the papal eucharist at the hands of a catholic priest. James II. duke of York, and brother of Charles, succeeded to the throne. James was a violent catholic.

Thus we see how God has overruled the conflicting passions of men, in this mighty struggle, of the reformation with popery, and liberty with tyranny, and placed the government and the church exactly in that point, which have proved to this day, to be best adapted to the peace and prosperity of that nation, and the good of the world. To illustrate this remark, let us take a view of the gigantic power of Lewis XIV. king of France. Lewis XIV. succeeded Lewis XIII. 1643, in the midst of the reign of Charles I. During his minority, and under the regency of the queen and cardinal Mazarine, France was, like England, distracted with feuds.

When Lewis took possession of the crown, he was the most splendid, ambitious monarch that ever filled the throne of France. He cherished the discords in England, and at the same time revived all the ancient claims of the crown under Charlemagne, and erected the standard of conquest to recover them.

Spain attempted to avail herself of the feuds in France, which arose out of the management of Mazarine ; but Lewis, united with Cromwell, the protector of the commonwealth of England, soon humbled Spain, and closed this war. The struggle for supremacy upon the ocean, which began between England and the seven United Provinces of Holland, in the reign of Charles I. still continued ; and England under Cromwell, gained a decided superiority over the Dutch.

Upon the accession of Charles II. Lewis availed himself of this strife, and engaged England in his views, to humble the Dutch, and add the low countries to France. For this purpose he assembled a most splendid military force, took the field in person, and entered Flanders at the head of his army.

At the same time the combined fleets of France and England amounted to one hundred ships. The United Provinces were thrown into the highest state of alarm ; they collected their fleet to guard and protect their ports, inundated their country, sued for peace, and offered the most flattering terms ; but all to no effect : their ruin was sealed by the vindictive malice of Charles, and the all-conquering ambition of Lewis. The terms were rejected, and the war pursued with vigor.

This roused up the energies of the Dutch, who had by their efforts ransomed their country from the ocean, and enriched it by their commerce. They declared the prince of Orange, stadtholder, or chief magistrate of the nation ; and prepared for defence. The throne of William was secured by the violent death of the De Witts, and others opposers in Holland ; and he took the field in person.—The conflict on the ocean was desperate, and the confederates successful ; but the stadtholder triumphed over Lewis in the low countries, and he was compelled to abandon all his conquests.

Spain and Germany, by an alliance, supported the stadtholder. The distracted state of England compelled Charles II. to withdraw from the war and offer his mediation. The war became a war of posts, and was attended with great displays of tactics and valor. At this time Sweden became confederate with France, and Charles II. a pensionary to Lewis, by a secret treaty.

Lewis became formidable at sea, and successful against the combined fleets of Spain and Holland, in a splendid naval action on the coast of France ; this victory was sealed by the death of the gallant De Ruyter, the Dutch admiral. The affairs of France again became prosperous, and Lewis was successful at all points, both against Holland and Spain. He triumphed over England, through the venality and corruption of Charles II. ; triumphed over Spain, Holland and the empire, and laid the foundation for the future splendor of his crown, by the possessions he retained in the low countries, at the peace of Nimeguen, in 1648.

CHAP. XXVIII.

France continued—Europe generally—League of Augsburg—Remarks.

Lewis XIV. notwithstanding the exhausted state of his treasury, still kept up his powerful military forces, and with them, that passion for glory, and lust of ambition, with which he commenced his reign, and which were the characteristic features of this haughty monarch. He assumed the dictatorial style of Charlemagne, seized on Strasburg, and rendered it impregnable, by the talents of the famous Vauban. He began to flatter himself that all Europe would soon feel his sway, and that he should establish the ancient dominion. To this end, he distracted the empire of Germany with feuds, excited the Turks to war against them, to humble the house of Austria, which would have been ruined, had not the king of Poland interposed with a powerful army, compelled the Turks to raise the siege of Vienna, abandon their conquests in Germany and Hungary, return to their former limits, and settle a peace.

Lewis embraced this favorable moment to extend his dominions, by seizing on several important parts of the low countries, and settled a peace with Spain, the Emperor of Germany, and turned his attention to his fleets.

At this critical moment, died the illustrious Colbert, prime minister of Lewis, and whose sagacious mind, as a statesman, and financier, had raised Lewis to the summit of his greatness. With the death of Colbert, fell the greatness of Lewis, and left his pride and ambition, like a ship in the midst of a tempest, without a pilot.

Lewis revoked the memorable edict of Nantz : that shield of the reformation under Henry IV. and put forth all his efforts to establish popery upon the ruin and conversion of protestantism ; but without effect. This cruel artifice of priestcraft, butchery, and military executions, ruined the manufacturing interest, which the immortal Colbert had promoted and encouraged amongst the protestants. One twentieth part of the whole number, fell a sacrifice to these barbarous and impolitic measures ; a price was set on the heads of the remainder, they were hunted like wild beasts of the forest, and forbidden, under penalty of death, to leave the kingdom.

In the face of all this severity, however, more than six hundred thousand protestants left the kingdom ; ruined the manufacturing interest of France, and transplanted it into the neighbouring kingdoms. This severity was not the result of submission to the Roman pontiff ; his haughty spirit led him to humble pope Innocent XI. in the most humiliating manner, and triumph over all his excommunications.

This cruel, and vindictive persecution against the reformation, arose from the haughty imperious spirit of Lewis, and from the weakness of his uninformed mind. He soon felt the rashness of these measures. The protestants in Germany, throughout the empire, formed the famous league of Augsburg, to restrain the overbearing spirit of France.

The emperor Leopold added Hungary to Austria, and placed his son Joseph upon that throne, upon the suppression of the Turkish invasion, and was now ready to become party in the league of Augsburg, against France.

Thus we see how God makes use of his means, to effect his ends, and with what wisdom all his great purposes are accomplished.

The art of printing had greatly facilitated the improvement of letters, and swept away that gross ignorance which had prevailed through the dark ages, (that nursery of bigotry and superstition ;) given expansion to the mind of man, and prepared the way for the reception of those great and important truths the immortal Luther was destined to unfold.

The excesses, corruptions and abuse of power, which at this time had become notorious in the catholic church, led to a general inquiry amongst the learned, and better informed part of society ; doubts began to arise with regard to many of the dogmas of the church, and the abuse of power in the sale of indulgencies (which had now become notoriously corrupt) staggered the faith of some, disgusted the feelings of others, and shocked all common sense.

The pen of Erasmus was pointed and severe, well calculated to excite doubts, and lead the public mind to pause, reflect and consider, whether all this was founded upon the authority of God.

The waste of blood and treasure, which had so long accompanied this despotic power, had fairly opened the way for the introduction of those truths, the immortal Luther was destined to unfold ; and Germany was well prepared to be the great theatre of action.

Armed with the authority of God, Luther stood forth, the great champion of truth ; unfolded the pure principles of that gospel which had been so long corrupted and abused : set at defiance that power which claimed and exercised the right of extirpating all opposition by force ; raised the public mind to resist that infallibility, they had now been led to doubt ; and by his firmness, learning, and talents, established the reformation upon an immoveable basis.

Germany, which had suffered most severely from the despotic power of the popes through the dark ages, was now destined to become the light of the world, in religion, and in science. Luther stood forth as the light of the gospel ; Copernicus, (of Thorn) unfolded the mysteries of the heavenly bodies, and taught the true doctrine of the solar system ; and Kepler illustrated the true figure of their orbits : all these combined, gave such expansion to the mind, as led to a more general inquiry, opened the way to a more general and correct understanding of the truth of religion, of nature, and of God.

Italy at this time was favoured also with her Gallileo, whose inventive genius greatly improved the telescope, by which the systems of Copernicus and Kepler were confirmed, and the rotation of the sun upon its own axis, the satellites of the several planets, the phases of Venus, and the mountains in the moon were all discovered.

All these great events combined, excited a general inquiry ; this was increased, and strengthened by the persecutions of the popes, who denounced the whole as one great system of absurdity and heresy. The inquisition of Italy, so late as 1633, passed a decree, declaring the solar system of Copernicus expressly contrary to the holy scriptures, false and absurd in sound philosophy, as well as erroneous in the faith !

These great luminaries of Germany, have diffused their light, as we have noticed, throughout the christian world, and have unfolded to men that great system of religious and literary truth which they now enjoy, and which, under their future improvements, they are destined to enjoy.

CHAP. XXIX.

England ; and Europe generally from the accession of James II. to the rise of the order of the Jesuits.

At this eventful period when the league of Augsburg had united the whole protestant cause of Europe, as one great family, to resist the overbearing power of that chastising rod, Lewis XIV. king of France, commenced the unhappy reign of James II. as successor of Charles II. of England. His character as a papist, under the title of duke of York, had occasioned much warmth of feeling and expression, during the reign of Charles, and was yet remembered. Notwithstanding his flattering assurances, he discovered the purposes of his heart, in his imperious speech to his parliament.

Conspiracy soon kindled into a flame, and raised an insurrection in the nation. At this time he commenced a career of general favor and indulgence to papists, both in England and Ireland, and issued a declaration of general indulgence, or liberty of conscience, by his own absolute and arbitrary power ; sent an ambassador to Rome, in order to unite the crown of England again to the holy see ; gave a public audience to the pope's nuncio, and consecrated four popish bishops in the king's chapel ; permitted the monks to appear at court in their respective habits ; attempted to introduce Roman catholics into the church and universities ; endeavored to gain the protestant dissenters, and to form them into a union with the catholics, by ordering a new declaration of indulgence, and causing it to be read in the pulpit by all of the established clergy.

The clergy resisted, and a general alarm was excited throughout the nation. They invited William, prince of Orange, (who had married Mary, daughter of James) to assume the government. He complied with the call of the nation, landed in England with a strong naval and military force, amidst the popular commotions and struggles, seized on the crown, and James fled to France. The Scotch submitted to the government of William; he summoned a convention to settle the affairs of the nation; who placed the crown upon William and Mary, by an instrument of settlement, which closed all the struggles of privilege and prerogative, and fixed the constitution upon a permanent basis.

During these mighty struggles, episcopacy had been established in England and Scotland; this occasioned at this time some division of sentiment, and some warmth of feeling; but the presbyterians, who composed the mass of the people in Scotland, favored and supported the throne of William and Mary.

James, at the same time sealed his own ruin by favoring a catholic insurrection in Ireland, and by the aid of Lewis XIV. actually embarking in France with a military force, and placing himself at its head. This occasioned a warm conflict between the English and Irish parliaments, and excited a general alarm in the nation; William declared war against Lewis, and became a party in the league of Augsburg.

At this time the divisions in Scotland were settled by the sword, and the government of William quietly established. James met with a warm resistance from the protestants, in Ireland, who were supported by William in person, who triumphed over James, defeated and destroyed his army, that he fled again to France: the insurrection was soon quelled, and all Ireland submitted to the government of William.

The spirit of faction was not yet quelled in England; the fire of the parties soon revived, appeared in parliamentary feuds, and was kindled into a blaze by the rashness of William, at the massacre of Glencoe, in Scotland. This excited a general alarm, which roused up the nation to a spirit of opposition and gratified the spirit of Lewis XIV. king of France—he immediately furnished James with a powerful naval and military force, who put himself at their head to invade England, and recover the crown ; but a decisive action gained at this critical moment over the French fleet by the English, checked the expedition ; closed all the future prospects of James ; and after a few more feuds in England, settled and established the government of William, and rendered the reformation again triumphant in England.

The league of Augsburg had now called forth all the efforts of Christendom, to humble the haughty, overbearing spirit of Lewis, and roused him up, like a lion of the forest, to take vengeance on his enemies. He cherished his alliance with the Turks to make a diversion in Hungary ; assembled an army of four hundred thousand men, and entered Germany and the low countries, with various success ; at the same time the fleet of Lewis gained a signal victory over the English and Dutch.

Lewis took the field in person, and appeared with great splendor in Flanders ; the war became general, and raged in Hungary, Germany, Flanders, Spain and Italy. Europe had never before witnessed such splendid armies, under such splendid captains, together with such displays of valour and military tactics. Mathematics, as applied to the art of gunnery and fortification, at this period, attained their highest perfection, under the talents of a Vauban. The war became generally a war of posts, and raged with various success from 1688, to the peace of Ryswick, with France, 1698, and of Carlowits with the Turks, 1699.

This war gave a general triumph to the reformation over popery, leagued with the infidels, and greatly facilitated the progress of the arts and sciences ; gave a new polish and lustre to military tactics, and a new splendor to society in Europe. The good effects of the reformation were generally felt and acknowledged, throughout Christendom ; this excited a general spirit of inquiry and learning amongst the catholic clergy, and a general improvement in their morals.

This ecclesiastical spirit of science and morals was greatly improved by a new monastic order, which sprang up at this time, styled the order of the Jesuits, from the frequent use they made of the name Jesu. This order became the immediate champions of the pontiffs—they became the confessors of all the catholic monarchs of Christendom, and by that means the organs of intelligence to their masters the popes, and rendered the chair of St. Peter the repository of all the intrigues of Europe.

They also served as ambassadors to the popes in all foreign courts, and thus the organs of the secrets of all the courts in the world. The zeal, intrigue, and corruption of this order caused its ruin in the eighteenth century. That general improvement of manners, literature, taste and refinement, which began to dawn in Europe in the distinguished reigns of Charles V. of Spain and Germany, Francis I. of France, and Henry VIII. of England, received a polish in this war, which with the commencement of the eighteenth century, commenced a new order of things in Europe.

CHAP. XXX.

Affairs of Europe generally—northern confederacy—capture of Gibraltar by the English.

FROM the time that Francis I. of France introduced the ladies at court, (about the middle of the seventeenth century) the drama of life in Europe has experienced an entire change; ferocity has given place to urbanity, and barbarism to refinement. Although a general corruption of morals grew out of this, in its early stages, which soon was refined into an elegant sensuality, and next into a polished system of gallantry, and romantic effeminacy; it was the means of giving that high polish to the reign of Lewis XIV.

In this splendid reign, the sword in single combat (which was also sanctioned by the former example of Francis I.) gave a check to ostentation, pride and haughteur, protected the characters and virtues of the fair sex, and united with their example, had a commanding influence, in forming the manners of the times.

All that splendid taste in the fine arts, and all that classical elegance, which had been revived in Italy a century before, were now transplanted into France, and flourished in the reign of Lewis XIV. The spirit of the reformation had given expansion to the mind of man; suppressed the overbearing ignorance and bigotry of the catholic domination; awakened freedom of thought, and freedom of speech, and diffused a general spirit of toleration throughout christendom, accompanied with a general influence on government and manners; these combined, paved the way for that liberty, literature and science, which has come down to us, and which we so richly enjoy.

Immediately after the peace of Ryswick, the declining health of Charles II. of Spain, opened a new field of intrigue amongst the competitors for the crown, and kindled a new flame in Europe. These competitors were no less than Lewis XIV. the emperor Leopold the I. of Germany, and the elector of Bavaria. Their claims of consanguinity, were nearly equal, and the general interest, and tranquillity of Europe, required the succession of the elector of Bavaria, because it would produce the least effects on the balance of power. The intrigues of the competitors ran high; all Europe took a lively interest in the struggle; the Spanish nation favored the lineal succession of the house of Bourbon, but the queen, who was a German princess, favored the emperor Leopold.

During this conflict of intrigue, a treaty of partition was framed in the most secret manner, between England, France, and Holland, to divide the kingdom and provinces of Spain, amongst the contracting parties, upon the demise of Charles. The secrets of this treaty soon reached the ears of Charles, and fired him, like a shock of electricity, with indignation and resentment. He summoned an extraordinary council, made his will, conveyed the succession to the elector of Bavaria, and recovered his health. The sudden death of the elector, defeated the will, and renewed the treaty of partition, upon an entire new plan. By this treaty it was stipulated, that no dauphin, or king of France, should ever wear the crown of Spain.

During this struggle of intrigue in the south of Europe, a new drama commenced in the north, under the reigns of Frederic, king of Denmark; Charles XII. king of Sweden; Augustus, elector of Saxony, and king of Poland; and Peter the I. emperor of Russia. The improvements of the north, had lain dormant in a great measure, with their long tranquillity, and had not kept pace with the refinements of the south; until this splendid constellation arose, and diffused its lustre over those regions.

I shall pass over, however, the mighty conflict which ensued amongst these sovereigns, and treat of it at large, in the third part of this work, and continue the affairs of the south. The sudden death of the elector of Bavaria, gave a new turn to the affairs of Spain, and placed Charles II. in a new dilemma ; he took the dernier resort, and appealed to the pope for counsel.

His holiness, dreading the power of Austria, at once advised him to bestow the crown of Spain upon the family of Bourbon : this advice was positive, and positively obeyed. Charles, by a private will, annulled his former will, and conveyed the crown of Spain to the duke of Anjou, second son of the dauphin.

During these intrigues, Charles died, the will was disclosed—Lewis XIV. at once accepted, and placed his grandson upon the throne of Spain, under the title of Philip the V. then a minor, and prepared to support him. This accession of strength to the house of Bourbon, already considered too powerful for the peace of Europe, and during the alarming reign of Lewis XIV. was considered as incompatible with the interest and safety of every free state. It roused all the potentates in the south to the protection of the common cause, and produced the grand alliance (so called) in 1701, signed by the plenipotentiaries of the emperor of Germany, the king of England, and the states' general, of the United Provinces.

The grand object of this league was to counteract the succession of the house of Bourbon to the crown of Spain ; and obtain a general security for the balance of power, and the peace of Europe ; with a reserve, that England and Holland might retain all their conquests in both the Indies. The operations of the grand confederacy in the north against Sweden had already commenced, and were now in their full operation.

At this eventful period, James II. who had taken refuge in France, died, and Louis had the temerity to acknowledge the son of James, as king of Great-Britain and Ireland, under the title of James III. This struck the fatal blow to the peace of Europe ; William resented the indignity, and prepared for action, and the grand confederacy prepared to co-operate. Lewis, sensible of his error, attempted to palliate the blow by an apology. The parliament of England passed a bill of attainder against the young prince, James III. and prepared to support the dignity of the crown.

At this critical juncture, William was thrown from his horse, and received a contusion which occasioned his death ; he was quietly succeeded by queen Anne, eldest surviving daughter of James II. 1702. She entered with spirit into the measures of William, in support of the grand alliance, and prepared for action.

Lord Godolphin was placed at the head of the treasury, and the earl of Marlborough at the head of the armies; war was declared against France in London, the Hague and Vienna at the same time. The protection of the general safety, rendered a union of interest more permanent and formidable in this compact, than in any that Europe had ever witnessed; and although Lewis was apparently strengthened by the union of the crowns of France and Spain, in his own family: it proved the reverse, and Spain was only a burthen on his hands, to be protected at home and abroad.

The gold of America was the only advantage that resulted to him—and this, the exhausted state of his treasury very much required. The earl of Marlborough took the field in Flanders, as commander in chief; he soon acquired the title of duke, and his exploits gave a lustre to the arms of the confederates.

The successes of the first campaign, led the duke of Savoy, and the king of Portugal, to join the confederates, 1703; although the duke was of the house of Bourbon, grandson of Lewis XIII. and father-in-law to Philip V. the young king of Spain. This union of the duke with the allies, was considered by Lewis as the ruin of his cause. All Europe, from north to south was the theatre of a general war, and divided into two great parties. In the south under the grand alliance, the war raged in Flanders, in Bavaria, in Spain, in Italy, and upon the ocean.

An insurrection broke out in Hungary, which penetrated to the gates of Vienna, and threatened the ruin of the house of Austria. Feuds sprang up in Scotland, founded on their resentment against king William for neglecting the Scotch settlement upon the isthmus of Darien during his reign, which endangered the peace of England, by the sharp contest between whig and tory factions.

The war raged in 1704 with various success by sea and land; but the conquest of Gibraltar was a most valuable acquisition to the English. This year the emperor Leopold died, and was succeeded by his son Joseph, who entered warmly into the measure of the alliance.

In 1705 the French were successful in Italy, the confederates in Spain. The war raged in Germany and Flanders with various success, but nothing decisive. In 1706 the confederates were successful, under the illustrious Marlborough in Flanders, and in Spain, under prince Charles, who entered Madrid, and was then crowned king of Spain under the title of Charles III. ; but was soon compelled to retire.

The English took the islands of Majorca and Ivica. Lewis XIV. under this pressure of his affairs, had recourse to the king of Sweden, Charles XII. then in his successful career in Poland and Saxony—but without effect : Charles had set his face for Moscow.

Lewis, upon this failure, sued for peace ; but without effect—the confederates resolved, “ that no peace shall be made with the house of Bourbon, so long as a prince of that house is on the throne of Spain.” The successes of England in Flanders, the conquest of Gibraltar, and the isles of the Mediterranean, gave strength to the crown, and confirmed that union of England and Scotland, which has since proved so salutary to the two kingdoms. The splendor of the duke of Marlborough in Flanders, of prince Eugene in Italy, and the arch duke Charles in Spain, gave strength and spirit to the confederates this year, and humbled the pride of Lewis.

CHAP. XXXI.

General Affairs of Europe to the death of Lewis XIV. and the suppression of the insurrection in Scotland—Remarks.

THE exhausted treasury of Lewis XIV. compelled him to desperate measures ; he ordered bills to be drawn upon his mint, and resolutely prepared for action ; the confederates were triumphant in Italy, and the French abandoned their conquests by a convention—the French were victorious however in Spain, at the battle of Almanzar, and the prospects of Philip V. stood high.

In 1707 prince Eugene and the duke of Savoy penetrated into France, laid seige to Toulon, and failed ; this with the successes in Spain, and feuds which sprang up in the councils of England, revived the hopes and spirits of Lewis ; but the success of the confederates in Flanders and Italy, and the suppression of the feuds in the English cabinet, together with the capture of Sardinia and Minorca, by the English, joined to the low state of his funds, pressed Louis in 1708 to make advantageous overtures of peace to the confederates. These they haughtily rejected, and pushed the war in 1709 with renewed vigour and success in Flanders.

Louis again pressed his overtures for peace, and the next year conferences were appointed at Gertruydenburg. Lewis made concessions at this conference which were humiliating to him, and served to flatter the pride, and raise the spirits, as well as the demands of the confederates: they rejected the overtures, broke off the conferences, and took the field, with renewed success, in Flanders. Charles III. entered Madrid at the head of his victorious army; but was soon compelled to restore it to Philip V.; and the war in Spain raged with various success.

At this time a new feud sprang up in the councils of England, and divided the champions of the nation; Godolphin and Marlborough, began to decline. The Tories cried out danger to church and state, and the pulpit echoed the cry. This produced a change in the ministry; Marlborough supported his popularity; but Godolphin was succeeded in the treasury by Harley, earl of Oxford. This feud again revived the claims of the pretender, and Godolphin espoused his cause; but the Tories triumphed in a new parliament, 1710. This year the arch duke Charles succeeded to the imperial throne, upon the death of the emperor Joseph, which gave some check to the bold plans of the duke of Marlborough. The parliament of England voted liberal supplies, and the war was pushed with vigour. The feuds in parliament called forth the best talents of the nation; a dignified speech from the queen, would have quieted, and united the councils of the nation, had not the influence of Marlborough produced an overheated zeal in the house of lords, and effected a secret treaty between England and France, which however destroyed his popularity and command, 1711.

The treaty fired the parties of England, with warmth and bitterness—it was not contended by the Whigs, that Spain could have been conquered at that time, and Charles III. placed upon the throne of Philip V. by the sword; but they did contend, that under the existing state of the armies, together with the low state of the finances of Lewis, the confederates under Marlborough in Flanders, might, in one more campaign, have penetrated to Paris, and compelled Lewis to depose his grand-son, Philip V. and place the arch duke upon the throne of Spain, and also have established a barrier on the north, which would have effectually humbled the house of Bourbon.

These truths the whigs in England realized, these truths the confederates all realized, and were severely mortified at their disappointment. They made great efforts, by the aid of prince Eugene, (who was invited by the whigs over into England for that purpose,) to renew the confederacy, and prosecute the war, but to no effect : the tories were established, and the councils firm ; and conferences for a general peace were opened at Utrecht.

The successive deaths of several of the princes of France, at this time, increased the apprehension, lest the crown of France and Spain should be united in one head, upon the death of Lewis ; and called forth all the energies of the contracting parties, to guard against this, by positive stipulation : which was, ultimately, though reluctantly, complied with, by Lewis, and he guaranteed the renunciation of his grandson, Philip V. to all claims upon the crown of France. This produced a secret cessation of arms on the part of England, which separated the English forces from the confederacy, and an open avowal of the treaty ensued.

The Dutch, the duke of Savoy, and the kings of Portugal and Spain, followed the example of the English ; and the emperor being left alone in the war, a general peace was concluded at Utrecht, and the storm of war once more hushed in the south, 1713. The parties ran high at this time, in England ; it became now well understood, that not only Godolphin, the ex-minister, but the duke of Marlborough himself, secretly favoured the cause of the pretender ; and that great efforts were made to induce his sister, the queen, to provide for his restoration.

James III. was a violent catholic, and as obstinately so as his father : this roused all the fears of the protestants, and when united with the feuds produced at the peace, distracted the nation.

A party, called jacobites, were actually engaged to restore the pretender : this called forth a vote of parliament, of one hundred thousand pounds, to whoever should apprehend him in Great Britain. During the violence of these measures, Queen Anne died, and was succeeded by George I. elector of Hanover : who placed the whigs at the head of the administration, commenced a general inquiry into the state of the nation, and the negociations of the peace of Utrecht, as the surest means of quieting the parties, and establishing his throne 1714.

In the midst of these scenes, died Lewis XIV. king of France, who was succeeded by Lewis XV. then a minor; and the government of France fell under the regency of the duke of Orleans, 1715. He espoused the cause of James III. (the pretender,) and secretly co-operated with the jacobites in England and Scotland, to effect his restoration. Great preparations were made this year, for the reception of James III. in England; and the jacobites invited him to land at Plymouth. A general insurrection took place in Scotland, and these hardy sons of the mountains, who boasted that they never had been conquered, tendered their services to James, in support of his claims to the crown of England.

This formidable conspiracy in Scotland and England, called forth the energies of George; and the kingdom of England and Scotland, were again torn with the distresses of a civil war. The pretender landed in Scotland: again the protestant cause was triumphant—that God who rides on the whirlwind and directs the storm, appeared in support of the reformation. The struggle was short; the fatal battle of Sheriffmuir decided the fate of the pretender, and his popish cause forever in England; his partisans dispersed, and he fled to France. A few executions suppressed the rebellion, restored the tranquillity of the nation, and established the throne.

The conflicting passions, which had harassed and distressed Europe, in the south, during the long and ambitious reign of Lewis XIV. were once more hushed into a general calm. The exhausted state of finances, throughout these kingdoms, rendered a general peace not only necessary: but actually forbade the renewal of hostilities.

France was content to secure her ancient limits, with the acquisition of the crown of Spain, to a branch of the house of Bourbon. England had secured a protestant succession, and the union of Scotland; but the emperor of Germany had obtained no adequate compensation for the blood and treasure expended in the war, excepting the union of Hungary, with the house of Austria.

At the close of the last war, by the peace of Ryswick, we turned our attention slightly, to the general improvement of manners, literature and the arts, since the reigns of Charles V. Frances I. and Henry VIII. in the middle of the sixteenth century: let us now take a view of the changes, which the long reign of Lewis XIV. produced, in the relative connection of the kingdoms in the south of Europe.

The high claims and pretensions, which marked the commencement of the reign of this haughty, overbearing monarch, called up the general attention of the nations to their common safety, and led them to enquire into the principles of their common interest and security. These principles led Spain, Italy, Germany, England and Holland to suspend their private interests and views, together with their private piques, and objects of ambition, and form one grand confederacy, to check the high menacing ambition of France. The successes of this coalition were displayed in the peace of Ryswick.

When the intrigues of Lewis to accomplish the union of the crowns of France and Spain, upon the death of Charles II. again threatened to commit the peace of Europe, and destroy the general interest, which the peace of Ryswick had secured—again the southern kingdoms coalesced, first under the triple alliance, and then generally ; humbled the gigantic power of France, reduced her to the last extremity, severed the union then contemplated, by express stipulation ; and the treaty of Utrecht, guaranteed to Europe a balance of power, which remained undisturbed down to the French revolution.

Thus we see, how from the private quarrels of individuals in the early ages, of neighboring chiefs, of neighboring and rival cities, of neighboring states, or kingdoms, either separately, or with private alliances to promote, or check ambition, the nations of Europe have become one great family, with separate views ; but one great union of interest, founded upon that balance of power, which they have effected by their great coalitions, and which has become inseparably interwoven, not only with the general safety and tranquillity, but with their very existence, as independent states and sovereignties.

CHAP. XXXII.

Europe, from the commencement of the quadruple alliance, to the accession of Francis I. of Austria.

WHEN the mighty struggle of ambition which called forth the triple alliance, and in succession involved all the south of Europe in a distressing and eventful war, to prevent the union of the crowns of France and Spain, in the house of Bourbon had been so successfully closed ; when Lewis XIV. the author of this mighty struggle, had guaranteed an eternal exclusion, to the union of the two crowns in the house of Bourbon, in order to restore that tranquillity which his ambition had disturbed, by exciting a war which he could no longer maintain, and to guarantee to his grandson Philip V. the quiet possession of the crown of Spain : when Philip had voluntarily sanctioned the measures of Lewis, his grandfather, and was quietly enjoying all that he possessed, or could in honor or justice claim : when all the contracting parties were contentedly enjoying that quiet, which the great interest of Europe required and demanded, after so long and arduous struggles as she had experienced, during the long reign of Lewis XIV. : it was to have been expected, that a repose so desirable, might have been continued.

What shall we say, when we announce, that the same spirit of ambition which fired the breast of Lewis, inflamed the heart of Philip V. and led him to light again the torch of war, by his intrigues to obtain the regency of France, during the minority of Lewis XV. and thereby secure the union of the two crowns of France and Spain. Although the conspirators were discovered in the house of Bourbon, and duly punished, and the duke of Orleans more firmly established in the regency ; the powers of Europe resented this outrage, and England, France, Holland and Germany, under the quadruple alliance, (so called) declared war against Spain in 1718.

The French invaded Spain on the northern frontier : the English triumphed over the Spanish fleet, and took the islands of Sicily and Sardinia : Philip complied with the terms prescribed, disgraced his minister, and sued for peace.

At this time, the famous Mississippi scheme appeared in France, and through the infatuating spirit of John Law, ruined their system of finance, and spread distress through the nation. The same spirit spread into England, and blew up what was called the south sea bubble, and produced the same effects upon the funds, and upon the nation, as the scheme of Law had produced in France. These damped the spirit for war in the two nations ; the operations of the alliance languished ; the death of the duke of Orleans in the year 1723, paved the way for peace, by the treaties of Vienna and Hanover, 1795 ; which was finally settled by the peace of Seville, in 1727.

Pending these negotiations, died George I. who was succeeded by his son George II. Under this succession, parties ran high in England; corruption, jealousy and strife, distracted the councils of the nation. During these struggles in England, died Augustus, king of Poland, 1733; and Lewis XV. of France, now on the throne, engaged with Spain and Sardinia, in a war against the emperor of Germany, to recover the crown of Poland for his father-in-law, Stanislaus Leckzinski, who once held it under the favor and protection of Charles XII. king of Sweden, by usurpation, and had fallen, and fled to France upon the restoration of Augustus. The French invaded Germany and Italy with such success, that the emperor sued for peace. Lewis relinquished his claims on the crown of Poland, and obtained for Stanislaus the duchy of Lorraine, with its cession to France, upon the death of Stanislaus, and peace was concluded, 1736.

During the distressing wars in Europe, for the last century, the commerce, and colonial possessions of England, France, Spain and Holland, rapidly progressed in North and South America, and both the Indies, and became the source of that wealth, by which these powers were enabled to equip such vast fleets, and raise and support such vast armies.

Although war was the means of increasing and prolonging the distresses of the nations, it became the instrument of encouraging and promoting the arts and sciences, of softening and polishing their ferocity of manners, of disseminating the principles of toleration in religion, and thereby establishing the reformation upon a more permanent basis.

During this period of commercial spirit and enterprise, the strife, and conflicting interests of England and Spain, led them into a commercial war, in 1739. This war became a war of plunder: The English exerted all their force to augment their maritime strength; to plunder and rifle the Spanish commerce, particularly those ships laden with the treasures of Peru.

They seized on the most wealthy commercial ports of Spain, in South America, and under various successes, were enriched with the spoils of war; particularly by the capture of a Spanish galleon, off the coast of Chili, in 1744, by lord Anson, who traversed the great Pacific with his prize, visited India, returned to England by the way of the Cape of Good Hope, and landed his treasure, where it was carried in great triumph, and deposited in the tower.

At the commencement of this war, died the last prince of the house of Austria, Charles VI. This death opened a new field for the powers of Europe. The treaty of Seville, which closed the war of the quadruple alliance against Spain—contemplating the exposed situation of the house of Austria, and anticipating the claims that would commence upon the death of the emperor, Charles VI. guaranteed by a general confederation, the right of succession to Maria Theresa, eldest daughter of Charles VI. and then wife of Francis, duke of Lorraine. Maria Theresa was acknowledged by all the states of Austria, and soon became extremely popular.

At this time a secret league took place, between Lewis XV. Frederic III. king of Prussia, and the elector of Bavaria, to divide the Austrian dominions. The king of Prussia opened the war upon Silesia, and soon placed his standard on the walls of Breslaw, the capital. The forces of France entered Germany, formed a junction with the elector, in Bavaria, and penetrated to Vienna. The empress retired to Presburg, in Hungary, where, by her artful address, she roused up the zeal and spirit of the nation, under old count Palfy, who soon appeared for the relief of Vienna.* The allies did not wait his approach, but filed off into Bohemia, invested, and took Prague, and crowned the elector of Bavaria king of Bohemia; from thence he proceeded to Frankfort, and was crowned emperor, under the title of Charles VII. 1742.

The gigantic strides of France, the dangerous state of Austria, and general interest of Germany, that engrossed the attention of George I. together with the good effects which resulted to the allies from the connection between England and Austria, in humbling the pride of Lewis XIV. induced George II. to espouse with warmth and zeal, the cause of Maria Theresa.

George carried with him the spirit of his people: he de-

* This address of the empress is worthy of record. When the empress had assembled the states of Hungary, she appeared at their head, and bearing her eldest, and her infant son in her arms, thus addressed them: "Abandoned by my friends, persecuted by my enemies, and attacked by my nearest relations, I have no resource left, but in your fidelity and valor. On you alone, I depend for relief; and into your hands I commit the son of your sovereign, and my just cause." Fired with indignation and rage, they drew their swords, and with tears of zeal and compassion, they exclaimed: "We will die for our king." The nobility were instantly in arms, and at the head of thirty thousand men.

posed his opposing ministry ; filled their places with such as were ready to second his views ; his parliament liberally granted supplies, and George assembled an army in Flanders of 36,000 men ; the Austrians penetrated into Bavaria, and took Munich.

At this critical moment, the court of France were struck, as with a clap of thunder, by the tidings of the treaty of Breslaw, and peace between Prussia and Austria.

The allies were closely invested in Prague, and their fate considered as desperate. The French, on the Rhine, made an effort to relieve Prague, but it failed : the duke De Belleisle, however by an artful movement, stole a march upon the besiegers, abandoned Prague, and led back his army, with all his baggage and artillery, to the banks of the Rhine.

Spain, in alliance with France, pushed the war in Italy, with such success, as to rouse up the king of Sardinia to an alliance with the empress, and king of England, and the war raged by sea and land. At the commencement of 1743, the French sued for peace—the allies refused. This artful policy kindled afresh the feuds of opposition in the British parliament ; George reinforced his army in Flanders, and took the field in person. This occasioned such suspicious movements, particularly at the battle of Dettingen, as damped the spirit of the allies, and caused the British general, the earl of Stain to resign in disgust.

The treaty of Worms, between the arch duchess, Maria Theresa, and the king of Sardinia, strengthened her prospects ; but her imperious deportment led several German princes to negotiate with the new emperor, Charles VII. at Frankfort.

These movements called forth a secret treaty at Fountainbleau, between France and Spain, to recover the sovereignty of the Mediterranean, and at the same time all the old intrigues for the restoration of the pretender were renewed, and correspondences opened between England, Scotland and France ; an army of fifteen thousand men assembled in France, under the celebrated count Saxe, and actually embarked for England, to restore the pretender. This diversion failed, and was defeated by violent storms, and all further movements were prevented by a superior British fleet, 1744.

The various operations, and various successes of the parties through this year and the next, in Flanders, Italy, Spain and Germany, are too numerous and complicated for detail ; suffice it to say, that at the close of the year 1745, all the contending powers were hushed to peace, excepting France and Austria : and the husband of Maria Theresa was crowned emperor, under the title of Francis I.

The successes of this war, strengthened and confirmed that mutual dependence and support, which the other alliance had encouraged, between Great-Britain and the house of Austria. As it proved to be then, so it has continued to be to this day, the great barrier against the overbearing ambition, and the gigantic strides of France.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Europe, from the accession of George II. of England to the confederacy against the king of Prussia, and war of 1756.

THE violent opposition to the continental war, which distracted the British councils, at the accession of George II. and rendered a change of ministry so necessary, went into retirement with the ex-ministers, and laid the foundation for that faction, which promoted and encouraged the return of the pretender, to seize on the crown of England. This spirit spread into Scotland, that hot-bed of rebellion, where an insurrection was soon in readiness to receive the pretender, and place him upon the English throne, in 1745, Fired with these expectations, together with the flattering prospects from France, Charles III. son of James III. embarked from France, and landed in Scotland unattended, and unsupported ; (his supplies from France having been blown back and blockaded, as before observed.) The Scottish chiefs rallied round his standard and marched into England with apparent success, but were soon compelled to retire into Scotland, where Charles enjoyed for a few days, the pride of mock majesty ; fought the fatal battle of Culloden, deserted his standard and his friends ; left them to their fate, and retired to France.

The severity of the government, in punishing the insurgent chiefs, and stripping them of their hereditary jurisdiction, throughout the highlands, humbled this rebellious spirit in Scotland, and secured the crown of England against all future claims from the pretender.

The war which continued on the continent between France and Austria, was rendered illustrious in Flanders, under marshal Saxe, by his successes in this campaign ; but the campaign in Italy was closed with various success in 1746.

The treaty of Fontainbleau, between France and Spain, was violated by a secret treaty, between France and the king of Sardinia, which roused the Spanish jealousy, and distracted the operations in Italy ; at this critical juncture died Philip the V. The government of Spain devolved upon the queen—but Ferdinand VI. the son of Philip V. succeeded to the throne.

The cause of France and Spain, soon became desperate in Italy—they retired to Genoa, but were soon compelled to abandon that city to her fate, and retire into France. The military exactions which the Austrians enforced upon Genoa, humbled, and almost ruined that haughty republic ; yet left them a spirit, which roused up and repelled their oppressive conquerors, and recovered their liberty. This closed the campaign. The French, at the same time threatened Hanover ; this caused a secret treaty between England and Prussia, and a subsidiary treaty between England and Russia. Thus arrayed, the parties prepared for action.

George II. published a spirited manifesto. The king of Prussia penetrated into Saxony, took Dresden, and compelled Augustus III. king of Poland, to take refuge with his army.

He next penetrated into Bohemia, with apparent success, under desperate conflicts, at the same time the capture of the whole Saxon army, opened his way to fall back into Saxony, and take up his winter quarters at Dresden.—Here he discovered the plan of the allies, to divide up his kingdom ; particularly Austria, Russia and Saxony, and preparations were made to open the campaign with vigor.

France opened the campaign, by a movement of eighty thousand men, to invade the electorate of Hanover, and at the same time sent a small force into Germany, to co-operate with Austria. George II. entered with zeal into the war, disgraced his opposing ministry, and strengthened his cause, by appointing his friends, and sent the duke of Cumberland into Germany, to defend Hanover, at the head of forty thousand men. The Russians prepared to co-operate with Austria.

The king of Prussia anticipated all their movements, entered Bohemia in four divisions, triumphed over one Austrian army, united his forces, triumphed over the main body of the Austrian forces in Bohemia, and invested them in Prague. Elated with the successes of this victory, with too much confidence, he detached a part of his army to check old marshal Daun, and soon followed in person with another detachment.

— These two great champions of the age met, and a battle ensued ; the carnage of 20,000 men witnessed the valor and obstinacy of the conflict ; both sides claimed the victory. The king of Prussia retired, raised the siege of Prague, and evacuated Bohemia. The remarks which have fallen from the pens of some of the greatest captains, in marking the errors of the king of Prussia, at this critical juncture, and showing how he might not only have remedied his misfortunes, but have triumphed over marshal Daun, are too lengthy for this work.

It must be evident at first view, to every reader, that the successes of the king, had inspired him with too much self-confidence, and too much contempt for his enemies, and that this caused his loss of Bohemia.

At this critical state of the king, the Russians entered Prussia on the north, with an army of one hundred thousand men, and triumphed over one of his best generals, in a signal victory ; the contest was sharp and desperate, the spirit of the Prussian charge, was received by the Russians upon the point of the bayonet, which displayed the firmness of their character and discipline ; the Prussians retired with great loss. The valor and firmness of the Russians had not been experienced in the south, at that day ; and this war opened a field for the cultivation of their discipline, and laid the foundation for such future operations as have been witnessed.

The English made some diversion on the coast of France this year, but without effect ; and the French seized on the English settlement of Madras, in the East Indies, which closed the naval operations of this year, 1747. The campaign was opened the next year, by a great accession of strength to all the parties, and the arms of France were again rendered illustrious in Flanders under marshal Saxe ; they overran all the low countries, and threatened Holland. The general alarm roused up the spirit of the Dutch ; they invested the prince of Orange, with the title of “ stadtholder, captain general and commander in chief of all the United Provinces ;” and made vigorous efforts to defend their country.

The illustrious marshal Saxe triumphed over all opposition ; and with the fall of Bergen-op-zoom, (the key of Dutch Brabant,) became master of the navigation of the Scheldt. The allied house of Bourbon were again unsuccessful, in all their efforts in Italy this year. The triumph of England in 1748, over the navies and commerce of France, by the capture of twelve ships of the line, and fifty East and West India merchantmen, struck a severe blow to the spirits of Lewis XV. and called his attention to a peace.

This year opened with a general congress at Aix-la-chapelle. The affairs of Lewis, although so highly successful in Flanders, had now become desperate : the ruin of his commerce and navy, cut off the resources of his treasury ; the failure of his hopes in Italy—the appointment of the grand duke, emperor, and thereby defeating the prime object of the war, in establishing the claims of the arch duchess Maria Theresa ; the treaty of Breslaw, which detached the king of Prussia from the confederacy ; the new powers of the stadtholder, which presented a formidable barrier on the part of Holland ; but above all the high state of the English funds, their liberality, particularly in subsidizing the empress of Russia, and at the same time despatching a powerful fleet to the East Indies, to recover Madras, and redeem Pondicherry—all pressed Lewis to efforts for peace. A cessation of arms soon ensued, and the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, soon closed the sanguinary conflict, 1748.

In this peace, the treaties of Westphalia, Rysa, &c. were confirmed ; all conquests were restored, the accession of the arch duchess confirmed, and the guarantee of the pragmatic sanction renewed by all the former contracting parties, and all things remained in statu quo, except the acquisition of Silesia to the king of Prussia.

This war is generally considered, as a useless, wanton waste of blood and treasure for no adequate purpose.—This is strictly true, so far as it regarded France and Spain : but far different with England : this war established the superiority of the English navy and commerce, confirmed the policy of the two former wars, of wasting the treasure, and humbling the house of Bourbon by continental alliances, whilst England bestowed her whole attention upon her navy, her commerce, and her colonies in the East and West Indies, and in North America, and laid the foundation of all her future greatness. The fruits of this war, saved her North American colonies.

The most flattering prospects of general tranquillity in Europe, succeeded the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, and continued, with the exception of some feuds and intrigues in the courts of England, France and Spain, down to the year 1756. During this period, some strife and intrigues sprang up, between the settlements of England and France in the East Indies ; but nothing decisive, and a treaty settled their claims.

In 1754, some collisions commenced between the English and French colonies in North America, which continued, and were interwoven with the seven years war, which commenced in 1756, and which raged generally in Europe. The operations of this war in America, I shall defer, and consider in the general history of America.

The English took advantage of these collisions in America, and commenced general depredations upon the commerce of France, and captured more than three hundred sail of merchant ships : at the same time commenced their intrigues upon the continent.

The state of the French funds, led the court of Lewis XV. to a new system of policy ; he bore the depredations of the English, without making reprisals—he remembered the perfidy of the king of Prussia, in deserting the confederates by the treaty of Breslaw ; he also remembered the cause of resentment the house of Austria justly entertained against that prince, for his alliance with France, to oppose the claims of the arch duchess, and for the acquisition of Silesia, which he obtained by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle.

He felt the ascendancy which George the II. had obtained in the two last wars, by his continental influence ; this he ascribed to his power, as elector of Hanover. Lewis cherished the resentment of the house of Austria, against the king of Prussia, and the two powers formed an alliance to punish the king of Prussia, and divide up his dominions ; they had the address to unite Russia and Sweden in this confederacy, and the war commenced by the invasion of Minorca, by the French, which was carried, through the defection of the British admiral Byng.

A general exultation reigned in France, and a general despondency in England, and their former high martial spirit, now tamely submitted to the introduction of German troops into England, to repel a threatened invasion from France. 1757.

CHAP. XXXIV.

General affairs of the seven years war in Europe, to the peace of Paris, 1763.

DURING the operations in Bohemia and Prussia, the duke of Cumberland retired before the French under the marshal De Etress, took refuge under the cannon of Stade, and saved his army, by signing the convention of Closterseven, abandoning Hanover to the French arms, and retiring to England. This occasioned a new revolution in the cabinet of George II. : the ex-minister was restored, and some diversion planned and executed against the coast of France ; but without success.

By these misfortunes in Europe together with some losses in America, the English felt sensibly their disgrace ; when the spirit of the nation was relieved by a favourable turn in their affairs, a successful recovery of their former losses, with some valuable acquisitions in the East Indies, and an exaction of two millions, to indemnify the expenses of the war.

The losses of the king of Prussia, constrained him to act on the defensive. The allied French and Austrians, invaded Saxony, and summoned Leipsic. The king advanced to meet them ; a battle ensued ; the king was victorious and the allies retired. Old mareschal Daun, at the same time advanced into Silesia, invested Schweidnitz, and carried it by storm ; attacked and subdued the prince of Bevern, took him prisoner, and entered Breslaw.

The king flew to the relief of Silesia, united his scattered forces, and prepared for action. Mareschal Daun, and prince Charles, advanced to meet the king, with the same spirits, that led the king into his misfortunes in Bohemia, viz. : too much self confidence ; and they in their turn experienced the same misfortune.

The king met the allies at Luthen, strongly posted, and awaiting his attack. Here was exhibited the decisive advantage of Prussian tactics and discipline, over the superior forces and position of the allies.

The king commenced the attack, by a movement on the right of the enemy's position ; and when mareschal Daun had weakened his left, to support his right, the king by a masterly display to the right, fell with his whole force upon their left : the battle was decisive, the carnage was great ; the allies were driven from their commanding position, and the king followed up his victory ; the allies retired out of Silesia, and the king entered Breslaw in triumph.

The successes of the king, set the example to all his generals, and the Russians and Swedes, were soon driven out of Prussia. These glorious successes of the king of Prussia, inspired his friends with fresh confidence, and roused up the electorate of Hanover, to assert their liberties. George II. placed the duke of Brunswick at their head, and by his successful valour, he compelled the French to retire out of Hanover, and repass the Rhine. These spirited measures in Prussia and Hanover, inspired the cabinet of George with fresh confidence, and led his minister, Mr. Pitt, to say, that America must be saved in Europe, and that the king of Prussia must be supported.

A new treaty was negotiated with the king of Prussia, and the parliament were liberal in their supplies for the war. A change took place in the French ministry, and the war raged upon the Rhine with various success. During these operations, the king of Prussia advanced in pursuit of mareschal Daun ; penetrated into Moravia, and laid seige to Olmutz.

Upon the intelligence that the Russians had entered Brandenburg, he raised the seige of Olmutz, retired in the face of that old hero, and returned into Prussia—met the Russians, and after a terrible conflict and carnage, he triumphed over them in the battle of Zorndorf : the Russians retired into Poland, and the king, by a masterly movement, again appeared in Saxony, for the relief of his brother, against the imperial and Austrian armies : the latter under old mareschal Daun. A desperate action ensued, the king retired—but gained his purpose, and was not pursued.

He passed again into Silesia ; expelled the Austrians, returned into Saxony ; compelled mareschal Daun to raise the siege of Dresden, and entered it in triumph. The splendid and triumphant displays of the arms of the king of Prussia, together with several successful diversions of England, on the coast of France, and the triumphant display of the English flag in the British channel, gave a new aspect to the affairs of Europe, and closed the campaign of 1758, gloriously.

The successes of the last season, enabled the king of Prussia, to open the next campaign, with a train of splendid successes, against the Russians in Poland, ; against the Swede in Pomerania : and against the Austrians in Silesia, Bohemia and Franconia. These, together with his plan of operation with the duke of Brunswick, gave promising assurances of a speedy issue to the war : when a sudden reverse of fortune, blasted all his fair prospects, and gave a new turn to the operations of the campaign.

The French penetrated into Germany with splendid success, and again threatened Hanover ; the duke of Brunswick retired to the confines of the electorate, and gave battle to the French. The success of this action, saved Hanover : the French retired towards the Rhine, and the duke posted a part of his army for the defence of Hanover, and detached the remainder to the relief of the king of Prussia, whose forces had received a severe check by the Russians in Silesia, where the king was about to repair in person ; when old mareschal Daun reinforced the Russians, and rendered that army about one hundred thousand strong : they took up a commanding position, and awaited the approach of the king.

Fired with resentment at the ravages of the enemy, and inflamed with the passions of war, the king with only fifty thousand men, hastened to the contest ; the Russians were broken, and routed : they again rallied their forces, and took post on a commanding eminence—the king made several desperate efforts to dislodge them ; but failed. The Austrian cavalry charged the Prussians in their turn, with success ; the action became general ; thrice the king at the head of his brave troops, led them to the charge—thrice his horse was shot under him, and his clothes pierced with balls ; but without effect ; the mass of force was against him, and baffled his efforts. The king retired, leaving a carnage of thirty thousand men ; more than half of which were Prussians ; night closed the scene, and prevented a total overthrow :

A singular anecdote of the king, in this memorable action, may be worth notice. Upon the success of the first charge, when the Prussians were in the Russian trenches ; the king, in the heat of the action, wrote the following message, and despatched it to the queen. “ We have driven the Russians from their entrenchments ; expect within two hours to hear of a glorious victory.” Immediately upon the change in the fortune of the day, the king addressed a second message to the queen, from the field of action. “ Remove from Berlin with the royal family. Let the archives be carried to Potzdam. The town may make conditions with the enemy." So fickle is the fortune of war.

His majesty fell back, took a commanding position, recruited and reinforced his army, was able to cover his capital and to the astonishment of Europe, to act on the offensive, and recover all his losses in Saxony, except Dresden ; by a masterly movement, he compelled the Russians to retire into Poland—and in spite of the Austrian generals marched into Saxony ; old mareschal Daun fell back upon Dresden.

Fired with his prospects, the king resolved to cut off the retreat of mareschal Daun, by a detachment from his own army ; reduce the Austrian army at a blow, and close the campaign with the recovery of Saxony, and the total overthrow of Daun. This rash measure, lost him the whole force, detached to intercept the retreat of the old mareschal ; who took up his position in his fortified camp, and the king retired into winter quarters.

Thus the campaign closed, after the most active operations, desperate carnage, and brilliant displays of arms, exactly where it began ; except the fall of Dresden to the Austrians.

The operations of the winter opened a new scene—the successes in America, led the English to make the most of their fleet, and they commenced a general attack upon the French West India colonies, and with general success. The French and Dutch made several efforts to ravage the English settlements in India, but failed.

At home also the French assembled their forces, equipped their fleets, and threatened to revenge the depredations of the English upon their coast, by invading England : this brought the theatre of action upon the water. A general blockade of the ports of France, with several desperate engagements between the English and French, closed this scene in 1760.

In 1761, the campaign opened with a general distribution of force, about the same as at the commencement of the last season, with a continuation of the general plan. The duke of Brunswick protected Hanover, by the decisive action of Warburg. The king of Prussia, sensible of his rashness the last campaign, particularly at the close, resolved to maintain his strong position, and act on the defensive.

He saw his dominions invaded by three powerful armies : the Russians upon the north ; one Austrian army in Saxony, under mareschal Daun ; and another in Silesia, under general Laudohn. By a movement, and success of Laudohn, the king was constrained to abandon his defensive plan : by a rapid movement, he marched into Saxony, and laid siege to Dresden : mareschal Daun obliged him to retire, and without an action.

At the same time Laudohn invested Breslaw ; and prince Henry compelled him to abandon it. The king, alarmed at the prospect of losing Silesia, by a junction between the Russians and mareschal Daun, made a masterly movement and flew to its relief with his whole army, passed five large rivers, with all his artillery and baggage, traversed a country more than two hundred miles in extent, and appeared in Silesia ; here he was enclosed by these three powerful armies, and his fate considered desperate.

The very night, on which an attack was concerted by the three generals, upon the camp of the king, he cautiously retired, took a strong and commanding position, and watched the movements of the enemy. They advanced to the attack, as was agreed, in dead of night ; but to their astonishment, the king was gone. At break of day he fell furiously upon Laudohn, and before mareschal Daun could arrive with succor, he routed and dispersed his army.

The Russians withdrew from the scene, mareschal Daun also retired, and took up a strong position in the mountains, and the king was relieved : but his relief was only to follow the Russians to his capital, where they penetrated, rifled his magazines and royal treasures, laid the city under contribution, with other ravages attendant on war, and retired.

This spread a general gloom over the affairs of the king. He, fired with indignation and rage, resolved to take vengeance on his enemies. With this view, he rushed into Saxony, with an army of fifty thousand men ; mareschal Daun followed him with an army of eighty thousand, took up a strong position, and watched the king.

Resolved to attack him in defiance of all his security, the king reconnoitered his position, drew out his army, and advanced to the charge. Mareschal Daun received him with the discharge of more than two hundred pieces of cannon ; victory long stood perched over the field—now this, and now that scale prevailed, until the great Daun was wounded, and carried off the field ; victory soon declared for the king—the Austrians fled, and left the field strewed with a terrible carnage, and night only saved the ruins of their army.

This victory revived the spirits of his friends, and the nation, and by his sudden movements, he recovered all Saxony, except Dresden. The Austrians abandoned Silesia, the Russians abandoned Pomerania, and retired into Poland, and the Swedes retired under the cannon of Stralsund.

Thus again the theatre of Europe has been drenched in blood, the most masterly military movements have been made, the most desperate and sanguinary battles have been fought, the greatest feats of arms have been displayed, and no decisive event has occurred.

The great contending parties are again balanced, as at the close of the last campaign ; but the success of the English in America, have richly compensated them for their liberal supplies afforded in the war. The French received a blow, which ruined their interest in North America, by the fall of Quebec, and the loss of Canada.

The French were equally unsuccessful in India, by the loss of Pondicherry, which fell into the hands of the English, January, 1761. This closed the French power in Hindostan, and confirmed to the English the supremacy of the whole Coromandel coast.

Again, we see the fruits of Continental alliances : so often, and so violently clamoured against in the English parliament. The French are ruined in America, in India, and have suffered serious losses in their navy, commerce, and West India islands, all the fruits of continental wars.

In the midst of this great continental struggle, and the successes of his reign, died George II. who was succeeded by his grandson, George III. then twenty-three years of age, Oct 25, 1760. He commenced his reign under the most favorable auspices, and received the applause of the nation, by a most popular speech to his parliament, in which he exclaimed—
“ Born in England, I glory in the name of Briton.”

The eyes of all parties, at home and abroad, were fixed on the king. At this eventful crisis, all christendom became sensible of the wisdom of that continental system of policy, which commenced in England, at the accession of William and Mary,* and during the memorable reign of Lewis XIV. of France, and which, by continuing down to this time, has wasted the resources of France and Holland, (the great naval and commercial rivals of England,) and enabled her to place her naval and commercial strength upon such a basis, as to hold the purse for confederated Europe in one hand, and wield the sword of destiny with the other, and thus sit arbiter of the world.

When George announced his resolution to his parliament, of supporting the continental system, it was applauded by a vote of supply of twenty millions sterling; a supply, which astonished Europe, struck dismay into the confederates, and led them into serious dispositions for peace.

The finances of France were drained; her navy and commerce were depressed; her affairs in India and America ruined, and her West-India colonies lay at the mercy of an English fleet, prepared to invade them. The courts of Vienna, Russia and Sweden, were in no better condition to prosecute the war.

A congress was accordingly assembled at Augsburg, to adjust the differences of the continental powers generally; but negotiations were opened at London, between France and England, for a separate peace: at this critical state of affairs, died Ferdiand VI. king of Spain, who was succeeded by his brother, Don Carlos, king of Naples and Sicily, now Charles III. This momentous event, gave a new change to the affairs of christendom, and laid the foundation for the famous family compact of the Bourbons, upon the thrones of France and Spain.†

The principle of uti possidetis,‡ or mutual retention of pos-

* It must be remembered, that continental coalitions first began, in the reign of Charles VIII. of France.

† The resentment shown by Mr. Pitt, closed at once the family compact between the courts of France and Spain. This compact roused the indignation of Mr. Pitt, and he called for a declaration of war against Spain; this was opposed with equal warmth, and the minister resigned in disgust. Upon the change of ministry in England, the courts of France and Spain, recalled their ministers from London, and issued mutual declarations of war, and at the same time attempted to coerce the king of Portugal into a co-operation, in the war; this failed, and they declared war with Portugal.

‡ The English had conquered from France, in North America—Nova Scotia, with the city of Louisburg—Lower Canada, with the cities sessions acquired by the parties in the war, spun out the negotiations at London : at the same time Charles III. sensible of the triumphs of England, over France, in America, by the great acquisitions of colonial territory, and alarmed for the security of Spanish America, attempted to interpose his influence in the negotiations at London ; but without success, and they were suspended.

Thus the negotiations for peace, at Augsburg and London, resulted in a general war, and again the whole south of Europe engaged in the struggle. During these negotiations, no cessation of hostilities ensued ; the war raged in Germany, the English invaded the coast of France, and took Bellisle. The French made another effort to enter the electorate of Hanover, but without success ; and the year 1762, closed without any thing decisive.

The year 1763, commenced with the invasion of Portugal, by the arms of France and Spain, but without success. The French renewed their attempts on Hanover—but without success.—The death of Elizabeth, empress of Russia, and the accession of the duke of Holstein, under the title of Peter III. gave some relief to the affairs of the king of Prussia.

Peter turned his whole attention to the organization of the affairs of his empire, took the position of mediator, between Austria and Prussia, and when his efforts proved abortive, declared war against Austria, and joined the king of Prussia. This change produced a peace between Sweden and Prussia. These two events left the king of Prussia at liberty to turn his whole attention to the two great champions of Austria, mareschal Daun and Laudohn.

At this critical moment died Peter the III. suddenly, and was succeeded by Catharine II. She confirmed the peace of Peter, but withdrew her troops, and left the Austrians and Prussians to settle their quarrel.—The king, by a grand movement, foiled the efforts of his opponents, recovered Schweidnitz, and settled a truce with Austria, for Saxony and Silesia. This produced a general truce throughout the empire.

During these movements in Russia and Germany, the English pursued the policy which they had now so fully ma-of Quebec and Montreal, together with all French America, except New-Orleans. They had, the last year, conquered Pondicherry, together with all the possessions of France in India, and some of her West-India islands.

tured : their naval expedition was crowned with the conquest of Martinico, and the city of Havannah, the capital of the island of Cuba, and key to the gulf of Mexico.

An expedition to Madras, in India, against Manilla, was crowned with the conquest of all the Philippine isles. In this triumphant position, the British minister announced his overtures of Peace : they were accepted by France and Spain ; approved by parliament, and the war closed by the peace of Paris, February, 1763.

By this peace the king of Prussia retained all his dominions, with the confirmation of Saxony and Silesia ; England retained all her conquests in North America, and restored to France and Spain, her conquests in the East and West-Indies. The close of this war, sealed the policy of the continental system of England, and established her upon the broad basis of mistress of the seas, and arbiter of the world. The war in Germany was closed by the treaty of Hubertsburg, the same year.

The splendor of the arts and sciences in Europe, kept pace with the splendor of commerce and arms ; these combined, gave a lustre to the affairs of the continent, and a new polish to christendom. The improvements of the stage, kept pace with the improvements of the age ; here, poetry, music and action combined, gave an expression to the theatre unknown before, to any age of the world. The general expansion given to the mind, by the reformation, kept pace with, and marked the progress of this bright luminary of the west. The persecutions of the papal power, had softened into a sullen state of tolerance.

The feuds in the councils of Lewis XIV. which called forth the bull Unigenitus from pope Benedict XIV. to decide the religious controversy between the Janesists and Jesuits, and which kindled a fire that continued to rage through the reign of Lewis XV. deserves some attention. The haughty impatience, and violent measures of Lewis XV. in dissolving the parliament of France, called up the general attention of the nation to this violence done to their liberties, and threatened the life of the king, by assassination.

The king escaped with a wound only : this brought him to his senses. He restored the parliament : and the Jesuits, fell a sacrifice to the resentments of the day. The king, by an edict, expelled them from his kingdom, and abolished their order in France.

This triumph of the parliament over the crown, and this triumph of the Janesists party over the order of the Jesuits, laid the foundation for the union of philosophy with infidelity, of freedom of inquiry with the violence of liberty, and paved the way for all the future sufferings of France.

In this age flourished Montesquieu, Helvetius, Voltaire, De Alembert, Diderot, Rosseau and Buffon. The same expansion of the mind in England, kept pace with liberty, and the reformation: there flourished a Locke, a Swift, with Addison, Pope and others; together with that host in the councils, and in the field, in the reign of queen Anne, who were the champions of all the future greatness of England.

In this age, appeared Bolingbroke and Hume: these, having drank at the fountain of Hobbes and Shaftsbury, by their talents and address, diffused the poison of infidelity through the channels of science, and corrupted the nation.

The arts in this age, kept pace with the sciences: music, painting, sculpture, architecture and husbandry, claimed a fair competition with the most refined ages of Greece, or Rome—and the science of government, as displayed in the balance of power in the English system, stood unrivalled in the annals of time.

We have now traced the progress of man on the great theatre of Europe, from that state of barbarism, into which he was precipitated, by the violence of the revolution in the western Roman empire, through all the extremes of ignorance, violence, superstition and licentiousness, with which he struggled for more than one thousand years—and marked the more prominent causes, which produced the eventual changes, that raised christendom to her present state of civil refinement.

CHAP. XXXV.

Discovery and settlement of America.

THE discovery of America, we have noticed; but the settlement and growth of this new world, has been reserved, as a distinct subject, that the narrative of events in Europe might not be interrupted, and that a proper field might be given for

DISCOVERY OF AMERICA.

On the evening of Oct. 11th, 1492, Columbus with his fleet of three ships, manned by 90 men, discovered the new world. His crew immediately threw themselves at his feet, implored pardon for their unbelief, and all united in a hymn of thanksgiving to God. At sunrise, they landed with a display of colors, warlike music and martial pomp. Columbus, richly dressed, with sword in hand, first set foot on the new world, and his men following, kissed the ground they had so long desired to see. They then took solemn possession of the country, erected a crucifix, returned thanks to God for their successful voyage, and planted the national flag, with the usual forms of their country.

the illustration of this extensive, and important subject ; a field so novel, and yet so interesting, so full of instruction.

The first outlines of the history of America, I have compressed into a chronological form, showing in the concisest manner, the first adventures, which led to the discoverery and settlement of the several parts of this new world.

Christopher Columbus, under the patronage of Ferdinand and Isabella, king and queen of Spain, discovered the islands of St. Salvador and Cuba, in the West-Indies, and returned to Spain, A. D. 1492.

Made a second voyage, which proved unsuccessful, 1493.

Made a third voyage, and discovered South America, 1498.

Americus Vespucius, under the patronage of the merchants of Seville, followed the track of Columbus, touched upon the continent of South America ; returned, published a pompous account of his voyage and discoveries, and gave his name to the continent of America, 1499.

John Cabot, a Venetian, obtained a grant from Henry VII. of England for foreign discoveries, explored the coast of North-America, touched upon the coast of Labrador, and returned to England, 1495—6.

He, in a second voyage explored the whole extent of the coast from Davis' Straits to Florida, discovered Newfoundland, and returned to England, 1497.

Sebastian Cabot, (son of John Cabot) under Henry VII. pursued the adventures of his father, visited Newfoundland, and carried several natives to England, 1502.

Brazil discovered by Alvarez de Cabral, on his voyage to India, 1500.

Cortez, the Spanish adventurer, conquered Mexico, 1521.

Peru was conquered by the Spanish adventurer Pizarro, 1540.

Terra Firma was settled, 1520.

The Portuguese settled Brazil, 1549.

Francis I. king of France, made some efforts for discoveries in the new world by John Verezano, a Florentine, but without success ; Verezano was lost in his second adventure, 1524.

Ten years after this, Francis made another effort, by James Quartier, who touched at Newfoundland ; discovered, and gave name to the gulf of St. Lawrence ; and made an unsuccessful attempt to find a passage to China. The next year he explored the St. Lawrence up to the rapids, wintered in the country at a fort which he built on the isle of Orleans, and in the spring carried back with him some of the natives to France, 1534.

Ferdinand de Soto, a Spaniard, made the first settlement in Florida, where he remained three years and died, and left his conquest to Alverdo, 1539.

Francis I. sent James Quartier to complete a settlement in Canada (or New France,) where he remained at a place called Charlebourg, about two years, and then retired to Newfoundland, 1540.

Francis I. sent out other adventurers to strengthen the settlement in Canada, where they wintered, but returned to France in the spring following: this failure checked all further efforts for settling Canada on the part of France during this reign. These adventurers to Canada, were succeeded by adventurers from Europe, for the discovery of the north-east passage to India, all of which failed, on account of the ice in the northern ocean. About this time began the Newfoundland fisheries, which have since proved so profitable to the world, 1542.

The French under Chatillon, made some further discoveries in East Florida, and attempted a settlement, which failed, 1562.

Charles IX. sent out three ships, and made a settlement on the river St. Mary, built a fort, and called the settlement Carolina, 1564.

This colony was overpowered by a fleet of six vessels from Spain, and all massacred, 1566.

The French sent out to Florida a fleet of three ships, to revenge on the Spaniards the murder of their countrymen.—The enterprise proved successful, they butchered the Spaniards, burnt and destroyed their fort and settlements, and returned to France: this closed the adventures from France to America for fifty years, 1568.

The discovery of a north-east passage to India having failed, the English began to explore the north west passage to India, under captain Frobisher, and under Sir Francis Drake, 1576.

Queen Elizabeth granted letters patent to Sir Humphrey Gilbert in 1579, for foreign discoveries, and in 1583 he touched at Newfoundland, and from thence to the continent, and took possession of North America, for the English crown.

In this adventure he was lost in a storm, and the enterprise failed, 1583.

In 1584, the coast of Virginia was discovered, named after the virgin queen, and settled by one hundred and seven persons near the river Roanoke; in 1586 they all returned to England with Sir Francis Drake, who touched there on his homeward passage. Sir Walter Raleigh sent out seven ships, with another colony, to the same settlement on the Roanoke, where they also endured extreme hardships, and were, in their turn, conveyed back to England by Sir Francis Drake. Soon after they were gone, a new colony arrived to support the first, with fifty men, who concluded to stay, notwithstanding the others had gone. The next year Sir Walter sent out a third colony to support the second; when they arrived at Roanoke, not a vestige of the former colony remained. This third colony consisted of one hundred and fifteen, who attempted to renew the former settlement at Roanoke.

Governor White came over again, to recruit the little colony in Virginia; but alas! they had all shared the fate of the two former, and not a vestige of them was to be found, 1596.

The English explored the coast, as far north as Cape Cod, and called the country North Virginia; but made no settlement, and returned to England, 1602.

The English made two adventures to Virginia, and not finding the third colony at Roanoke, and being roughly handled by the natives, they all returned to England, 1603.

The French began the settlement at Port Royal, and other places on the bay of Fundy, 1604.

The English explored the coast of the province of Maine, made no settlement, and returned to England, 1605.

The London company (by virtue of letters patent, under James I. king of England,) sent out a colony to South Virginia, and began a settlement at Powhattan, or James river, 1606.

In 1607 they sent out a second colony, and settled James Town in South Virginia, on James river. This was the first town planted in North America, notwithstanding all the efforts which had been made: but the next winter, James Town was burnt. This year the Plymouth company sent out, and settled a small colony at the mouth of Sagadahoc river, in North Virginia, of forty-five persons, under captain Popham their president; the severity of the winter, together with the loss of their stores by fire ruined this colony : and the few that remained returned in the spring to England. This misfortune deterred all further settlements in North Virginia for several years. The French began the settlement of Quebec,

In 1608 and 9, the London company sent out supplies, and a recruit of two hundred persons, to strengthen the colony at James Town, which now amounted to five hundred men. Admiral Somers, on his passage to America, with a part of this little fleet, was wrecked on one of the Bahama islands, and lost his ship, but the crew and passengers were all saved, and remained there until the next year, when they were all taken off by lord De la War, on his passage to Virginia, to enter upon the government of this little colony—which the last year consisted of five hundred men, but was now reduced to sixty ; who had abandoned the colony and embarked for England ; but being met by their new governor, they were persuaded to return to James Town, where they all arrived safe, June 10th, 1610.

In 1611, two supplies of three hundred men each, were sent to this colony, together with cattle, swine, &c. to enable them to cultivate their own supplies.

In 1609, captain Henry Hudson, under a commission of king James I. in the service of the East India company, in quest of a north west passage to India, discovered North, or Hudson's river, and the same voyage discovered Hudson's bay.— In 1613, the Dutch West India company opened a trade to this river ; and in 1623 established trading houses on Connecticut river ; claimed all the country from Cape Cod to Cape Henlopen, and called it New Netherlands ; this commenced the settlement of New York. At this time the Virginians sent and dislodged the French from all their settlements in North America, excepting Quebec ; and brought all their effects to Virginia, with all their vessels. The French, Dutch, and English carried on an advantageous trade with the natives ; and in coasting along the shores for this purpose, made further discoveries, and drew charts, one of which, drawn by a captain Smith, changed the name of North Virginia, to that of New England, which it continues to hold.

Baffin's bay was discovered by William Baffin, in search for a north west passage,

The distresses of war, famine and pestilence, amongst the natives of New-England, prepared the way for a more quiet possession—and the little colony of puritans, from the flock of the reverend John Robinson, to make their settlement at Plymouth.

The whole extent of coast being now explored, from the gulf of Mexico to Davis' Straits, it will exceed the limits of this work to detail the subsequent adventures and settlements; I shall therefore comprise the whole in one short chronological table.

Quebec, the capital of Lower Canada, settled by the French,	1608.
Newfoundland by the English,	1610.
Virginia, do.	1610.
New York, } do.	1614.
New Jersey, }
New Plymouth, by the puritan colony,	1620.
Nova Scotia, by the Scotch, under Sir William Alexander,	1622.
Confirmed to the English by France, after several changes, at the peace,	1648.
New Hampshire settled by the English,	1623.
Delaware and Pennsylvania, by the Swedes and Fins,	1627.
Massachusetts Bay, by the English,	1628.
Maryland, do.	1633.
Connecticut and Rhode Island, from Massachusetts Bay,	1635.
New Jersey, under a grant to the duke of York, by the English,	1664.
South Carolina, do.	1669.
Pennsylvania, by a grant to William Penn, do.	1682.
North Carolina, by the English,	1728.
Georgia, do.	1732.
Vermont, by New Hampshire and New York,	1764.
Kentucky, from Virginia, under Col. Boon,	1773.
Ohio, from Connecticut and other states,	1787.
Tennessee, do.	1789.
The territories of Michigan, Illinois and Indiana, about	1780 & 1801.
Louisiana purchased of France for fifteen millions of dollars,	1803.
The territory of Orleans, under the name of the State of Louisiana, was admitted into the Union,	1812.
The territory of Mississippi was admitted into the Union,	1818.
The territories of Indiana and Illinois were admitted,	1818.

The District of Maine, (now State of Maine) with the territory of Missouri, was admitted, 1820.

By this table may be seen the most rapid and extensive settlements, that have ever been witnessed in the family of man ; embracing an extent of territory, from the gulf of Mexico on the south, to the Hudson's bay on the north, and from the Atlantic shores on the east, to the interior wilds of Louisiana on the west—more than 2000 miles square, embracing a population of more than fourteen millions of free people,—all accomplished in the space of two centuries : those very two centuries in which we have witnessed the conflicts and distresses on the continent of Europe, since the reigns of Charles V. of Spain, Francis I. of France, and Henry VIII. of England.

That age of the reformation, when the immortal Luther commenced his glorious career, and accomplished the prediction of the prophet St. John, in Revelations xiv. 6—laid the foundation for the religious liberties of Europe, and the civil and religious liberties of America.

A history of the rise and progress of the several States of America, their private disputes, their conflicts with the natives, together with the genius and forms of their governments, from the great similarity that was common to the whole, would be tedious and uninteresting. I will select the colony of Plymouth, and with this commence and continue the history of America.

This little family of puritans, fired with that civil and religious zeal which shone so conspicuous at the close of the reign of James I. in resisting the overbearing influence of popery, and the usurpations of the crown, and in establishing the commonwealth in England, in the reign of Charles I.—rallied round their clergyman, the Rev. John Robinson, a pious godly man, retired from the persecutions of their country, and passed over into Holland: not pleased with the Dutch, the flock divided, and a little colony of 101, embarked for America, and landed at Plymouth, Nov. 20, O. S. 1620. The sufferings they endured from the severity of the climate, the hostile character of the natives, and the want of supplies, were too distressing to be described ; yet they were endured, with all that patience and resignation which the gospel affords, to all those who love and obey its dictates, and cherish in their hearts the purity of its principles.

At this time a general spirit of foreign adventure prevailed, and commenced settlements extensively upon the Atlantic shores of North America, as may be seen by the chronological table; the emigrations from England, (although in detached parts,) retained a general union and harmony, as having sprung from one great family. They all brought out with them those principles of liberty which prevailed over tyranny in England, and established the commonwealth under Oliver Cromwell—yet in forming their civil institutions, they retained the true principles of that balance of power in the three branches of the British government, with an elective chief magistrate, which secured to them all the blessings of civil and religious liberty; these they enjoyed, and laid the foundation of our present great national compact.

The use of gun-powder gave the first settlers of America a superiority over the wild, barbarous, untutored savages of this howling wilderness, which nothing of human invention could have supplied; this, by spreading terror and astonishment, with carnage and destruction, overawed these hardy sons of nature, and either repelled them from their borders, or tamed them to peace and submission.

Although the rapid progress of the settlements encroached upon their rights; robbed them of their corn-fields and their hunting grounds; and kindled resentments, which often broke out into resistance, violence, and savage war; these were soon subdued by the all conquering force of fire arms. Treaties were made with the chiefs, lands were purchased, or ceded by the rights of conquest, and in 1755 the colonies of New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina, had all established colonial governments, and were able to assert and maintain their rights against the savage and barbarous depredations of the natives, and the encroachments of their neighbors the French. The French were settled on the north, on the island of Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, and the Canadas, with a line of military posts extending from Quebec through the western line of the colonies to New-Orleans.

At this time the government of France had become jealous of the rising strength of these colonies, and fired with that ambition of giving law to the world, which we have seen displayed in the reigns of Lewis XIV. and XV. they contemplated the conquest of all British America; and by an attack upon these colonies in 1755, commenced that seven years's war, which drenched Europe and America in blood ; that war which was rendered so illustrious in Europe, by the successful displays of the talents of the king of Prussia, and was so gloriously closed, in 1763.

CHAP. XXXVI.

General operations of the seven years' war in America, to the peace of 1763—with some remarks.

A particular detail of the events and operations of the war of 1755—6, in America, will give a more distinct character of the natives, and their savage wars, as well as the character, genius, and civil and religious institutions of the colonies, than can otherwise be obtained.

The settlement of Nova Scotia, (which was made by the Scotch,) after repeated struggles, was ceded by France to England, by the peace of Utrecht, 1713. During these struggles, and when France was in possession, the French population surpassed the Scotch and English, and rendered Nova Scotia distinctly a French colony, to which France had given the name of Le Acadie, and the inhabitants assumed the name of neutrals.

The English government, being dissatisfied with the neutrality of Le Acadie, in the war of 1746 ; immediately upon the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, sent out a colony from England, to settle and build the town of Halifax. The object of this commanding position was, to hold a balance of power in those seas, and protect the valuable fisheries.

This movement thwarted the views, alarmed the pride, and excited the jealousy of France. A question of limits and boundary, sprang up between the two powers in Nova Scotia, and soon extended through the whole line, from the gulf of St. Lawrence, to the mouth of the Mississippi.

The particular controversy about limits and boundaries, through this vast and extensive howling wilderness ; boundaries which neither of the parties had ever enjoyed, but which both contemplated to enjoy hereafter, would be useless here—suffice it to say, the French, fired with resentment, first pushed their encroachments in Le Acadie, or Nova Scotia, and next excited the natives and French to make depredations.

They seized on a trading establishment, which Virginia had made on the Ohio river, massacred all the settlers, plundered and carried off their booty, to the amount of twenty thousand pounds, and claimed the jurisdiction as belonging to New France, (comprehending the Canadas and Louisiana.) They next seized on another Virginia settlement, at the forks of the Monongahela, with a force of one thousand men, and eighteen pieces of cannon.

These formidable encroachments threw the colonies into the highest alarm, soon produced an order from England to repel force with force, and war commenced. Here began in America the scourging of that rod, which instead of a curse, as was then considered, has proved the means of consolidating and securing, all the blessings of free and independent America.

The orders of the crown were obeyed; but what could be the resistance of the colonies, in their discordant, disjoined state, against a power acting promptly under one head, and that, the governor of all new France.

The same controversies which distracted the English nation, were carried with the different colonies into the new world. The strife of religion and government, sowed the seeds of bitterness in the several colonies—they quarrelled with their governors, they quarrelled with the crown, and they quarrelled with each other, about limits and jurisdiction. The spirit of their religions were different; some catholic, some protestant; this rendered the genius of their governments different, some verging towards monarchy, others to democracy. All producing a want of union and concert.

This was well understood by France, and soon realized by Great-Britain and the colonies. To remedy these evils, and to be able to call forth their resources with energy, a congress of all the colonies was proposed, and held in the city of Albany, and the chiefs of the Iroquois, (or six nations,) were invited to attend. The intrigues of the French, defeated the plan of engaging the Iroquois in the war; but their neutrality was secured by presents from the crown of England, and the promise of repelling the French from their country.

Fired with zeal and unanimity, the congress resolved to prosecute the war, and support the British claims in North America. Major Washington was despatched from Virginia, to watch the motions of the enemy, and recover the settlements on the Ohio and Monongahela, but without any decisive operations. The intrigues of the courts of France and England, disguised all their operations under the mask of peace, but at the same time, they sent powerful fleets and armaments to support their claims in America.

A collision between these fleets, in the gulf of St. Lawrence, and the capture of two sixty-four gun ships by the English, closed this diplomatic farce, and commenced the war. This success gave spirit to the British nation, and kindled a flame of ardor, zeal and vigor, throughout the colonies.

The legislature of Massachusetts bay, passed an act of non-intercourse with Louisburg, and sent reinforcements to Nova Scotia. The successes of colonel Moncton, soon established the British government, and restored tranquillity to Nova Scotia.

During these general operations, the French had established themselves upon the Monongahela, and built the strong post, called fort Duquesne, at the confluence, where Pittsburg now stands. An expedition was planned to co-operate with major Washington, under the command of the British general Braddock, in reducing this post. General Braddock, unacquainted with Indian warfare, and fired with the ambition of his nation, was precipitated into a scene, unknown in the tactics of Europe, and indescribable in human language.

At mid day, near the object of his destination, and in the midst of security, a terrible fire of musketry poured in upon him, on all sides, accompanied with the most hideous and tremendous yells of those hellhounds of the forest; the whole thicket was in a blaze with the explosion of an Indian ambuscade, and not an enemy to be seen; the whole wilderness resounded with the terrors of the war whoop—the plain was strewed with heaps of dead, and the troops appalled with the horrors of the scene, and the groans of the dying. Braddock was slain. The illustrious major, (now colonel Washington,) conducted the retreat, and led off the shattered remains of this army, with the loss of all their artillery, baggage, &c. together with their general, and all the principal officers. The regular force retired to Albana, to join general Shirley—and Virginia was left to her fate.

The want of union in their councils and measures, rendered the efforts of the southern states feeble and ineffectual; but New-York and New-Jersey, combining with New-England—passed decrees of non-intercourse with all the French settlements in North America, and united in two grand expeditions against Crown Point and Niagara: the first under sir William Johnson, and the second under general Shirley.

The colonial troops were assembled at Albany, when the news of the defeat at fort Duquesne, was announced; this damped the ardor of the enterprise: the attempt upon Niagara was deferred, and the expedition to Crown Point abandoned, after some successful skirmishing. The armies went into winter quarters, and closed the campaign of 1757.

In 1758, the spirits of England and America were raised, by the restoration of Mr. Pitt, to the head of the administration; but the convention of Closter-seven, in Germany, and the failure of Mr. Pitt's grand expedition to the coast of France, damped their ardor. Great supplies of troops and military stores however were sent to America, and an expedition was planned against Louisburg, under lord Loudon; but just at the critical moment of attempting the enterprise, intelligence arrived, that Louisburg was reinforced from France, by a strong fleet and armament—and that attack was abandoned.

During these movements, the French had seized on fort Oswego, at the confluence of the river of the same name with Lake Ontario, which secured the ascendancy over the Iroquois, (or six nations,) together with all the tribes that surround the great lakes, and left the whole extent of the colonial settlements exposed to their ravages. The finest villages fell a sacrifice to savage depredations. Flushed with success, the French planned an expedition against fort William Henry, (upon the south side of lake George,) and carried it almost without opposition; the garrison, although protected by a capitulation, were permitted to suffer all the horrors of an Indian massacre.

These misfortunes overwhelmed the kingdom and the colonies, with a gloom and melancholy, bordering on despair. They began to fear that all was lost—when a ray of light appeared in the East: the British arms triumphed over the French in India—the town of Calcutta was restored by the efforts of the famous colonel Clive: the company were reinstated in all their privileges and possessions, and extensive and valuable acquisitions crowned their conquests in India.

During these operations in the east, lord Loudon had been succeeded in America, by general Abercrombie, and the expedition of Louisburg renewed. A strong detachment from Nova Scotia, under general Amherst, supported by a powerful fleet, joined general Abercrombie, and appeared before Louisburg. The place was invested by sea and land; and in six weeks, the success of the British arms was crowned by the capture of Louisburg, and the whole island of Cape Breton, together with an important naval force, stationed for the defence of the harbor. This secured to the English the command of the fisheries, and the gulph of St. Lawrence, and raised the spirits of the colonies.

Flushed with success, general Abercrombie repaired to Albany, took the command of the army of the north, and commenced an expedition against Ticonderoga and Crown Point. He embarked upon lake George, with about 16,000 men, after slight successes, and little opposition, and appeared by forced marches before Crown Point: here he found a strong position, defended by a morass, a strong breast work, and a chevaux de frise: his impatience led him to commence the attack, before his artillery had arrived; the assault was desperate, the defence firm, and the defeat decisive; the general was compelled to retire, with the loss of about 2000 men. To repair this loss and disgrace, general Abercrombie detached colonel Bradstreet, with 3000 men, to reduce fort Frontenac, at the confluence of Lake Ontario with the St. Lawrence.

This expedition was crowned with success: the fort, with an immense quantity of provisions and military stores, with sixty pieces of cannon, and nine armed sloops, were the trophies of this victory.

This success gave spirit to the expedition now planned against Fort Du Quesne, under Gen Forbes. The French appalled at the loss of Louisburg and Frontenac, abandoned the fort and retired down the Ohio to their settlements on the Mississippi.

These successes in America gave strength and confidence to the English administration, and spirit and union to the colonies, secured a general quiet throughout their extensive frontier, and closed the operations of 1758.

GREAT preparations were made in England and America, during the winter, to bring the war in America to a close the ensuing campaign. The balance of the great contending parties on the continent, still found employment for the arms and resources of France, and left England at liberty to turn her whole attention to the American war. The minister assumed a train of the boldest movements, and was peculiarly fortunate in his selection of officers to command.

He sent a strong land and naval force up the St. Lawrence to invest Quebec, under the command of the illustrious Wolfe, and concerted a plan of operations under Gen. Amherst, by the way of Lake Champlain, to penetrate into Canada, and co-operate with Gen. Wolfe, in the capture of Quebec.

The movements were made with great firmness and skill. Wolfe appeared with his fleet before Quebec, early in the season; here he found a fortress strongly garrisoned, and supported with a powerful force of French, Canadians and Indians, and rendered almost impregnable both by nature and art. Struck with astonishment at the object before him, he took up his position, and put forth all the efforts of his genius to accomplish his purpose.

In the mean time, the army under Gen. Amherst was early in motion, the fortresses of Ticonderoga and Crown Point, became the trophies of his victories; the garrisons had retired to the Isle Au Noix, and waited his approach.

The Genl advanced to the attack, but finding the position too strong, and the season far advanced, retired to Crown Point, and took up his winter quarters, without having learned the fate of Gen. Wolfe. Not so with Wolfe—he spun out the season with various efforts; but his prospects were so faint that the energies of his mind began to abate; the insurmountable obstacles opposed to the ardor of his spirits, wasted his health, and the approach of winter led him to despair of success.

He called a council of war, in which it was resolved to carry their future operations above the town, and if possible, force the French general Montcalm, to an engagement. Accordingly the fleet moved with the tide, in the silence of night, up the river, passed the city, and with unprecedented alacrity and skill, the whole army was landed, and conducted up a precipice by their gallant general, in the dead of night; a precipice considered almost impassable by an individual in the light of day.

On the approach of morn, the whole British army were formed on the plain, with their general at their head. The enemy soon had intelligence of their position, and Montcalm marched out of his strong camp to give him battle.

The regulars of France, with the Canada militia, commenced a distant fire, accompanied with the hideous yells of their numerous Indian allies, and appeared to be able to overwhelm with numbers this hero, with his little phalanx. General Wolfe took the precaution to reserve his fire, and receive the enemy at the distance of about forty paces; he then opened a fire upon them which checked their career; this, when renewed, threw them into disorder; again, when repeated, threw them into flight; at this critical moment fell the illustrious Wolfe, the hero of the plains of Abraham—the cry of “they run,” reached his ear; he raised his head and asked who run? The reply was, “the enemy run”—he exclaimed then I die in peace, and expired.

The gallant generals Townsend and Murray took vengeance on the fugitives with the bayonet, and the highland broadsword; the gallant Montcalm was mortally wounded; the plains of Abraham were strewn with the carnage of the dead and the dying. The victors pursued and threatened to enter the city commixed with the fugitives, and in the midst of triumph to plant their standards upon the walls of Quebec; but they checked their career, and in five days the city fell by capitulation.

Thus fell Quebec, the key of French America, and thus fell great Wolfe, at thirty-five years of age, the pride and ornament of his country, and his country's arms. This was not the triumph of Wolfe over Montcalm, not the triumph of conquest over the fall of a city, however strong the fortress, nor the triumph of England over France. The God of our Fathers stood arbiter of the scene, and wielded the destiny. The triumph was the triumph of the reformation; religion over superstition, patriotism, over tyranny, and liberty over despotism. It was the triumph of the church in the wilderness; it was the triumph of the motto of our fathers: “Qui transtulit sustinet;” (He who transplanted sustains.) By the fall of Quebec, protestanism, triumphed over popery, and the colonies were free.

The French again put forth their efforts to suppress the growing power of England, in India; the conflicts were sharp and desperate, but the English were triumphant. The French abetted a conflict of rivalry between the Dutch and English in India, but the English were again triumphant.

These multiplied successes of England depressed the spirits of the French; they in their turn like the English, had recourse to the expedient of invasion, to rouse the spirits of the nation. Boats and small craft were assembled in the ports of France, and formidable preparations made for the desired object; but the vigilance and superiority of the English navy, rendered abortive all such plans, and triumphed over the fleets of France successively, as they put to sea.

These naval victories, added to the triumphs in America and India, raised the spirit of England, and shewed them where their true strength lay, viz. in cherishing the wars of the continent by liberal supplies, and following their naval and commercial system. Three millions sterling were voted by way of subsidy in Germany, and twenty-five thousand troops to protect the electorate of Hanover, and support the king of Prussia.

New operations commenced in Canada, with the opening of the spring; that part of the army of Montcalm, which fled off towards Montreal, in the victory of general Wolfe, were there reinforced by Canadians and Indians, under the command of Monsieur de Levi, who had succeeded Montcalm in the command. With this force, the French general concerted measures to recover the city of Quebec.

He embarked his army in the month of April, with all his artillery, under the convoy of six stout frigates, fell down the river, and appeared before Quebec. The garrison under the command of the brave general Murray, which in autumn consisted of five thousand men, was now reduced to three. With this small but intrepid force, general Murray marched out upon the plains of Abraham, and gave the enemy battle; but overpowered by numbers, he was compelled to retire, with the loss of one thousand men. This effort gave a check to the enemy, and spirit to the garrison; a vigorous siege and defence commenced. A fleet from England arrived in the month of June, put an end to the siege, and the French general retired to Montreal.

During these operations, Gen. Amherst concerted measures for the reduction of Montreal. He gave orders to general Murray to embark his army at Quebec, proceed by water and meet him at Montreal. He directed one operation against the Isle Au Noix; another upon the enemy by the way of Oswego, and took the direction himself by the way of Lake Ontario, with his whole army; the movements all succeeded, and generals Amherst and Murray appeared the same day before Montreal, and the detachment arrived the next day from the Isle Au Noix.

The city was summoned, a capitulation signed, and Detroit, Michilimachinac, and every other French military post or depot were surrendered to the arms of his Britanic Majesty—the French troops were returned to France, and the Canadas cleared.

This blow sealed the fate of France in America, and left her nothing but the pitiful subterfuge of exciting the murderous tomahawk and scalping knife of the Cherokees, against the colony of South Carolina. This was soon suppressed by spirited exertions; the Cherokees punished, their towns burnt, and these savages humbled.

The town of New-Orleans stood alone to France a solitary monument of all her vast possessions in America. The war in India still raged, and the successes of the English the last year, excited them to attempt the conquest of Pondicherry, which was taken from the French, 1761. In the midst of these triumphs died George II. and was succeeded by his grandson George III., Oct. 25, 1760.

With the conquest of Canada, and the suppression of the Cherokees, the war closed in America. The British forces returned to England, excepting such as were necessary to garrison the military posts in Canada, and upon the frontier; and the colonies were left to pursue their domestic repose, enjoy their commerce, and extend their settlements. The peace of Paris, in 1763, closed the war in Europe, America and India, and all christendom was again hushed to repose.

The colonies had learnt one most important lesson this war, that was, how to unite their discordant interests, and render private considerations subservient to the general good. A lesson, which nothing but the disasters of the first campaigns could have taught, and brought them to practice. This lesson, the policy of the English government continued to cultivate and strengthen, by checking and controlling the spirit of some of the colonies, which appeared too independent in their governments, and in withdrawing their charters, and sending over governors appointed by the crown.

This soon sowed the seeds of jealousy between the crown and colonies, which began to ripen early into indignation and resentment, by frequent and severe collisions, between the people and the governors, accompanied with spirit, and sometimes outrage,

CHAP. XXXVII.

Causes which led to the American Revolution—general events to the invasion of New York.

THE rapid settlements and population, together with the prosperous commerce of the colonies, united to that ardent active spirit of enterprize which had shone so conspicuous through the war, began to excite the attention of England.—They foresaw, that such a combination of power, would at some future day become independent, and that then was the time to put on the shackles to check and controul it. With this view, they commenced a system of taxation, by duties on commerce in 1764, and on stamps in 1765, under the flattering pretext of raising supplies, to indemnify the expenses of the war.

The colonies resented this infringement upon their rights, resisted the encroachments by spirited remonstrances, and adopted this maxim: “that taxation without representation, was an infringement of liberty;” their demand was—“withdraw your taxes, and leave the fiscal concerns of America, (or the colonies,) to be conducted upon the floor of their own councils;” here they were at issue. Sprung from one common stock, the same blood flowed in the veins, the same spirit fired the breast of both parties—and this was the result :

Virginia resisted by spirited resolves, May, 1765.

Virginia, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland and South Carolina, sent a representation and formed a colonial congress at New York, October, 1765.

This, like the grand assembly at Albany, gave union, strength, and spirit to the colonies; tumults commenced in Boston, and spread through the country; acts of non-importation were passed, which lessened the imports from Britain this year, 880,621*l.* 1766.

At this time a general estimate of free white population in the colonies was 926,000, extended on the sea coast, from Georgia to the province of Maine. The dignified and manly resistance of the colonies, caused the repeal of the duties on stamps, 1766.

An act of parliament imposed a duty on paper and glass, June, 1767.

This again roused the passions of the colonies. Circular letters, tumults, &c. became the order of the day generally in 1768.

Acts of non-importation became general in 1769.

The British force stationed at Boston, fired on the populace, and caused the famous massacre of Boston, 1770.

This outrage spread such a flame through the colonies, that the British government repealed all the taxes this year excepting the duty of 3d per pound on tea. This led to associations through the colonies, not to drink tea; and all those who violated these associations, were held and considered as traitors and Tories.

An armed schooner belonging to the British, was burnt by a mob in disguise at Rhode Island,

Tea sent back by some colonies,
1772.

A cargo of tea was seized in the port of Boston by a mob in disguise, and thrown into the dock, 1773.

Upon the news of this, the government of England sent out a naval and land force, and took possession of the port of Boston, under the command of Gen. Gage, 1774.

The colonies, fired with indignation at this outrage on their liberties, assembled a general congress at Philadelphia, and elected Peyton Randolph, President, and Charles Thomson, Secretary, September 5, 1774.

Congress passed several resolutions highly important to the interest of the colonies, and dissolved, October 26.

They were now resolved to repel force by force, and an action commenced at Lexington and Concord, between a detachment of the British forces in Boston, and a scattered collection of militia of those places; the British, galled by a scattering fire from the stone walls, hedges and other coverts, made a hasty retreat into Boston, and left the field to the victors, April 19, 1775.

The news of this conflict spread like lightning through the country: hill illumined hill, and man electrized man. The heroes of the old war left their teams in the field, and their ploughs standing in the furrows, and in their rustic dress, repaired to the field of action, and enrolled themselves in the ranks of their country.

The mad councils of England, and frantic system of their measures, had now armed the nation against itself. Here commenced a sanguinary conflict of liberty against usurpation, on those very fields which the fathers (driven by the persecutions of their own country) had wrested from the savages of the forest, and where they had planted the pure seeds of the reformation one hundred and fifty years before; here the sons of those sires were summoned to arms in defence of their altars, their arms and their firesides, to repel the murderous dominion of Britain: the conflict was desperate, but the issue was glorious.

Without arms or discipline, without money, without credit, without allies, without military stores, and without union;—with a scattered population, not then exceeding one million; the sons of the puritans entered the lists with the gigantic power of Britain, then mistress of the seas, and arbiter of the world.

Their first step was, to collect an army; this was effected by an assemblage of the militia of the vicinity generally, and by detachments from the militia of the neighboring states, and next from the colonies generally. The English were invested in the town of Boston, under the command of Gen. Ward, and at the same time he sent off a detachment, and seized Fort Ticonderoga, May 10th, 1775. Their next step was to promote union. A Congress was elected from all the colonies, and assembled in Philadelphia, May 10th, 1775. The resolves of this Congress will ever stand on the historic page, a splendid monument of the wisdom, firmness, dignity and spirit of the American character.

They settled the fundamental principles of union, action and support; and upon the motion of two members to enter their protest against the measures of the congress, the spirit of the day was expressed by that old patriot, Samuel Adams, of Boston: "I should advise persisting in our struggle for liberty, though it were revealed from heaven, that nine hundred and ninety-nine were to perish, and only one of a thousand to survive, and retain his liberty. One such free man, must possess more virtue, and enjoy more happiness, than one thousand slaves—let him propagate his like, and transmit to them what he hath so nobly preserved." This was a fair sample of the general spirit of congress, and of the nation.

During these transactions, great efforts were made, both in America and England, to effect a reconciliation, and heal the differences. The earl of Chatham stood forth in parliament, the champion of virtue, and his country's interest; his reasoning was pure, nervous and forcible; and to an audience with hearts open to conviction, would have been irresistible; but it was lost upon parliament, and with it the colonies were lost.

Congress now assumed the style of the twelve United Colonies, June 7, and elected George Washington, of Virginia, commander in chief of the American armies, June 15th; he accepted the command, and repaired to Cambridge. The congratulations which he received, and his dignified replies, interested the feelings, confidence and affections of the nation.

Method, order and discipline began to be felt through the army, and the enemy were completely invested in Boston. Congress at this time published a declaration, by the way of manifesto, unfolding to the world, the causes of the contest—and the resolutions of the colonies. They drew and signed a petition to the king, and an address to the inhabitants of England; recommended the general forming and training the militia, throughout the colonies, and a detachment of one fourth as minute men, for all sudden emergencies; and called the attention of the colonies to their armed vessels, and the defence of their seaports.

They established a general post-office, to extend from Georgia to Maine, and appointed Benjamin Franklin postmaster general: they also established a hospital for 20,000 men. These general outlines being settled, all parties prepared for action.

The torch of war was again kindled by the destructive battle of Bunker's Hill, and the conflagration of Charlestown. The flames flashed through the country, kindled afresh the spirit of patriotism, and the ardour of revenge; and the public feeling was alive to the contest, from Georgia to Maine. This was one of the most important movements in the American revolution.

The operations in the siege of Boston, were changed into a regular approach, for the purpose of attempting a general attack; and at the same time an expedition was formed, and sent up the Kennebec river into Canada, under Col. Arnold, to co-operate with the main army, which were advancing by the way of Lake Champlain and Montreal, under Gen. Montgomery, to reduce the city of Quebec. General Gage retired from the command of Boston, and Gen. Howe succeeded, Sept. 1775.

The destruction of the town of Falmouth, by the British, on the eastern shores of Massachusetts, again kindled the flames of revenge, October, 1775; and the ardor of the occasion was seized, for an attack on Boston. To facilitate the operations, several rich storeships from England, laden with ordnance, small arms, camp equipage and military stores, were captured by the Americans, and conveyed to the army.

During these movements, the army, destined to the capture of Canada, under Gen. Montgomery, proceeded by the way of Lake Champlain, took Montreal, (November 15th,) and the other military posts in its vicinity—proceeded down the river, and joined Colonel Arnold, about the 1st December; they commenced an attack upon the city by assault; it failed—and Gen. Montgomery fell in the attempt. The siege was continued, and the army reinforced from Montreal and the states; where they suffered severely by the small pox, and the severities of winter. In the month of May, they abandoned the siege, upon the arrival of succor from England, and returned to Montreal.

General Washington, in the spring, erected a redoubt upon Dorchester heights, and threatened to bombard Boston.—This approach excited alarm, and Gen. Howe made immediate preparations to evacuate the town: he assembled his fleet, embarked his troops, and set sail for Halifax.

General Washington, penetrating the design of the enemy, drew off his army, retired to New York, and made preparations to receive him; passed over with his army to Long Island, and fortified the Narrows to prevent the passage of the enemy into the harbour of New York.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Revolution continued to the capture of Gen. Prescott at Rhode-Island, September, 1777.

ABOUT the first of January, 1776, the Liverpool frigate arrived off Norfolk, (Virginia) from England, and laid that rich commercial town in ashes; and in the month of February, the British began their depredations in North Carolina and Georgia, which were serious in their operations and consequences. In the month of June, a strong British naval force made an attack upon Charleston (S. C.); they were opposed with great firmness, and obliged to abandon the enterprise, with severe loss.

Gen. Clinton and Lord Cornwallis expected to have landed a strong force, and commenced their southern conquests at this time; but the severe losses sustained by their fleet, defeated the enterprise, and they retired to New York. In the month of August, lord Dunmore sent off his negro booty of about 1000, to Bermuda, withdrew from Virginia, and repaired to New-York.

On the 12th of July, lord Howe arrived at the Hook from England, by the way of Halifax, with a fleet and reinforcements, and charged with a commission to negotiate separately and individually with the states, for a return of peace. He made known the duties of the commissioners, to Gen Washington and to Congress, and they were circulated through the country, in the public prints. Congress at the same time met the commission with a publication of the Declaration of Independence, which passed the 4th of July; the campaign was opened, and the armies put in motion.

Gen. Howe landed his army upon Long-Island, supported by generals Clinton, Grant, earl Percy and lord Cornwallis, and commenced his operations against Gen. Washington, who had chosen this position, to cover New-York.

The action of Flatbush, compelled General Washington to retire with loss, and under cover of the night, cross over into New-York. This he accomplished by a most masterly movement, without loss; left a detachment for the protection of the city: garrisoned the forts at Haeblear and Kingsbridge, and made a stand. On the 15th of September, Gen. Howe took possession of New-York, and began his operations.

General Washington invested New-York until the 18th of October: he then abandoned his position to defeat an enterprise concerted by general Howe to cut off his communication with New-England, by landing a strong force in his rear. Gen. Washington retired to White Plains, where he sustained an assault from general Howe, which was firmly resisted, and General Washington retired to the high grounds, and took a strong position. Gen. Howe retired to Kingsbridge, commenced an attack upon the American forts, and carried by assault, such as were not abandoned by the Americans, and butchered the garrisons.

The fall of these posts opened the passage of the Hudson to general Howe; Gen. Washington was compelled to cross over into New Jersey, and retire to Newark. The losses in the action at Flatbush, at White Plains, and in the forts ; the departure of the Massachusetts militia, whose term of service had expired ; and the gloomy state of the army, retreating before a strong victorious British force, rendered the American cause desperate, at this eventful moment.

General Washington could assemble at Newark, only thirty-five hundred troops, to support the cause of liberty against the whole British army, of about ten thousand. Even Gen. Washington himself gave up all as lost, and with his most confidential officers, talked of retiring hastily into Virginia, or beyond the Alleghany, for security.

This scene was distressing ; a whole week passed before general Howe joined lord Cornwallis, and commenced his operations ; and during all this time, not one company, even of Jersey militia, joined the army.

On the 28th of November Gen. Washington retired from Newark to Brunswick : lord Cornwallis entered it almost at the same hour ; Gen. Washington retired to Princeton : his lordship held his position at Brunswick according to orders.

At this critical moment, the service of the Jersey and Maryland brigades expired, and they withdrew against the most pressing remonstrances.

October 7, Gen. Washington retired from Princeton, as lord Cornwallis entered it, and the next day his lordship entered Trenton, just as General Washington had crossed the Delaware, about midnight. Gen. Washington secured the boats upon the Delaware, and prevented his lordship's pursuit.

Lord Howe issued the proclamation of the king's commissioners, offering pardon and peace to all who should submit in sixty days.

The low state of the army, and of the public feeling, rendered this proclamation highly alarming at this time. Men of distinction, in great numbers, in that part of the country, embraced the overture, and made their submission.

General Lee, who harassed the rear of the British army with a small force, was surprised and taken Dec. 13, and the British boasted that they had taken the palladium of America, and considered the contest at a close.

Under this pressure of distress, well might an army despond, reduced almost to a cypher, without pay, without clothes, without supplies, and staining the snow with their blood stained steps, as they fled before the victorious enemy ; well might their country despond, when they saw their liberties waste away, and about to expire under the pressure of an overwhelming foe.

At this eventful crisis, General Washington, by the assistance of general Mifflin, collected a body of Pennsylvania militia, from Philadelphia and the interior, and gave support to his army. With this force, he resolved to strike a bold stroke, and attempt to recover the losses and spirits of the army, and of the nation; accordingly he took advantage of the enemy's not passing the river in their pursuit, and prepared to act on the offensive.

On the night of the 25th of December, 1776, General Washington recrossed the Delaware, under cover of a thick snow storm, and commenced an attack,—gained a signal victory—put the enemy to flight—and took up the position at Trenton, with about one thousand prisoners, with all their camp utensils and arms.

Upon the recovery of the enemy, under a strong reinforcement, General Washington sent off his prisoners into the country, and retired to Princeton; where he exposed his person between two fires, repulsed the enemy, and pursued them to Brunswick.

Lord Cornwallis assembled all his forces, made a bold stand, and General Washington took up his position at Morristown. The depressed state of the army when they evacuated New-Jersey, had not only alarmed the nation, but congress; and the sudden successes resulting from the affair at Trenton, had not only rekindled the spirit of the country, but called forth an act of congress, empowering general Washington “to collect sixteen thousand infantry, three thousand horse, three regiments of artillery, and a corps of engineers, appoint their officers and establish their pay: to call from all the states such militia as he shall judge necessary; form such depots of magazines and stores as he may think proper; to displace all officers under a brigadier, and fill all vacancies; to take whatever he may want for the service, wherever he may be, paying reasonably therefor; and to confine all who shall refuse the paper currency; all this for the term of six months.”

Despair had roused Congress from their cautious security, and the successes of Trenton and Princeton had fully evinced, that under God, Washington must be the saviour of his country. Thus light arose out of this thick darkness, and order out of this confusion, and the foundation was laid on which the liberty of America was secured.

The brutality of the British, had now roused the indignation of New-Jersey; the fire of Lexington was again rekindled, and spread through the nation; Lord Cornwallis was closely invested in his camp at Amboy, after being surprised and driven from Elizabethtown with great loss; and the mass of the people were alive to the contest; the state was generally cleared, and the winter passed without any important operations.

During these movements in New-Jersey, the American army under generals Gates and Arnold, retreated out of Canada, before sir Guy Carleton, and General Burgoyne, which will be noticed under the northern expedition.

Gen. Howe took the field in person, and embarked the heavy baggage of the army from Amboy for New-York, and prepared to revenge the affair of Trenton upon Gen. Washington; he made a feint to embark his army, and by a sudden movement, recalled the troops, formed and commenced a sudden attack upon a detachment of the American army; but was compelled to retire with loss, and embark his army on to Staten Island, June 30, 1777.

Thus ended the expedition into Jersey, an expedition in which, when viewed in its operations and effects, it must be evident to all, the hand of God was most conspicuously displayed for the salvation of the American cause; turned the councils of her enemies into foolishness, and out of weakness brought forth strength.

Tryon, the tory governor of New-York, made an attempt with a strong force from New-York, in the month of April, to destroy the American stores at Danbury, and succeeded generally; the party was severely harrassed by general Woster, who fell with glory in pursuing the enemy, and by general Arnold, who distinguished himself in this affair. Governor Tryon embarked his force, and returned to New-York.

General Howe remained in New-York, assembled his fleet, selected a detachment of his best troops, making a strong and well appointed force, with ordnance and stores for a distant expedition, embarked on board his fleet, and fell down to the Hook.

At this time, whilst general Howe was manœuvring with his fleet to deceive the American general with regard to his destination, a party of volunteers and militia under colonel Barton, passed over on to Rhode-Island, surprised Gen. Pres-cot in his quarters at Newport, and brought him off safe, with one of his aids. Gen. Prescott, with a strong British force, had taken possession of Newport in December, 1776, about the time of the battle of Trenton.

The expedition of Gen. Howe now claims our attention.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Revolution continued, from the expedition of general Howe to Philadelphia, September 1777, to the battle of Camden in North Carolina.

IN 1777, general Howe embarked about sixteen thousand troops on board his fleet at New-York, and put to sea upon a secret expedition. General Washington detached the flower of the American army into the state of New-Jersey, to watch his motions, and to be in readiness to cover Philadelphia.

General Howe, after several movements with his fleet upon the coast, entered the Chesapeake bay, and landed his troops at the ferry of Elk. General Washington advanced to meet him; an action was fought at Chad's-Ford, September 11th, and general Howe was successful; general Washington retired, and after several days manœuvering, general Howe entered Philadelphia, September 26th, and congress removed to Lancaster.

On the 4th of October, the action of Germantown was fought with a detachment of the British; the Americans were successful, and the detachment retired to Philadelphia, where they were closely invested through the winter. The American army was, at this time, in the most distressed situation; without clothes, shoes, stockings, and even breeches and blankets: more than two thousand were marched without shoes, through frost and snow, leaving the traces of their march by their blood.

During these movements, lord Howe moved his fleet round into the Delaware—which occasioned the conflicts of fort Mifflin and Red bank; and the protection of the fleet, secured the communication with the sea.

The last season, general Burgoyne had been sent out from England, to Canada, with a strong force to co-operate with the British forces at New-York, and form a junction at Albany. Sir Guy Carlton, then governor of Canada, with the aid of general Burgoyne, soon recovered the province—and the American army retired by the way of lake Champlain. Winter closed the scene. General Burgoyne pursued, the next season, and appeared on the plains of Saratoga, (state of New-York,) in the month of October : at the same time, a detachment of the naval and land forces at New-York, proceeded up the river, and burnt the town of Esopus. This again excited the public feeling.

The successful action of Bennington, against a detachment of the army of Burgoyne, had given high spirits in that vicinity : the American army under general Gates, was reinforced with fresh drafts of militia, and was soon able to invest general Burgoyne in his camp, at Saratoga. Alarmed at his critical situation, he attempted to retire ; this was impracticable—the Americans had destroyed all the bridges : he next proposed to give battle—this became desperate ; the Americans were strong, their spirits were high, and their attacks were sharp and desperate. Struck with astonishment, general Burgoyne proposed to surrender ; a capitulation was signed, and the whole British army laid down their arms, and became prisoners of war, October 16, 1777.

The general depression which had alarmed the public mind, during these formidable operations, was removed at a blow : again a general impulse was given to the public feeling : the plan of severing the eastern and western, (or southern) states, fell with the fall of Burgoyne, and new energies and new efforts were diffused through the nation. A success so novel, and yet so important, humbled the pride of Britain, in her councils—gave a lustre to the American arms at home and abroad, and closed the campaign of 1777.

France, Spain and Holland now became parties in the war. In the course of the winter, commissioners from England appeared at Philadelphia, with artful terms of accommodation, to weaken the union and energies of America : these were properly treated. At the opening of the spring, sir Henry Clinton, seeing no advantage resulting from his position at Philadelphia, prepared to return to New-York.

About the 1st of June, 1778, sir Henry Clinton evacuated Philadelphia, and took up his march. General Washington pressed close upon his rear : both armies were about ten thousand strong. At Monmouth, in New-Jersey, general Washington came up with sir Henry, and ordered general Lee, at the head of the advance guard, to commence an attack, for the purpose of a general action, and assured him of his support with the main army. The failure of this attack, by Gen. Lee's doubtful movements, caused the failure of the action. Gen. Lee was tried by a court martial, which deprived him of his command. Sir Henry withdrew in the night, and the Americans who had laid on their arms impatient for the attack in the morning, were disappointed of their hopes.

Sir Henry retired by forced marches to Sandy-Hook, where he was met by the fleet under lord Howe, embarked his army and passed into New-York, July 5.

At this time a French fleet arrived at Delaware bay, for the purpose of blockading the British squadron; learning their departure for New-York, they pursued and arrived off the hook, where they received a communication from general Washington, with a request to repair to Newport, and co-operate with the Americans, in reducing the British force under general Prescott. They repaired to Newport accordingly. The British fleet followed from New-York and appeared off the harbor. The French fleet slipped their cables, put to sea, and met the English; an action commenced—both fleets were severely shattered; the English withdrew, and retired to New-York, and the French to Boston, to refit, and from thence to the West-Indies; the attack upon Rhode-Island failed.

Sept. 1779, a French fleet of 20 sail of the line, frigates, &c. was destined against the Island of Grenada, (in the West-Indies.) At the request of Gen. Lincoln, who was then posted at Charleston, (S. C.) Count De Estaing, the French Admiral, repaired to the American coast, and co-operated with Gen. Lincoln, in an attempt to dislodge the English from Savannah in Georgia. This was the first foreign aid the Americans had received, excepting the attempt upon Rhode-Island in 1778, and opened the way for future, and more important operations.

The attempt failed, and the French Admiral withdrew from the American coast, and repaired to his station in the West-Indies. Sir Henry Clinton, upon the departure of the French fleet, resumed his southern enterprize, and dispatched admiral Arbuthnot on the 26th of December, 1779, with a squadron, detached from the fleet at New-York, to recover the losses of 1776, at Charleston. For this purpose he also embarked a land force of 7000 men, under his command, accompanied by lord Cornwallis, to seize on the city of Charleston, (S. C.) and subdue the southern states.

Sir Henry proceeded to his destined port, landed his troops, and carried the city of Charleston by a regular siege. The garrison, under the brave Gen. Lincoln, made a dignified defence, but were overpowered by a commanding superiority of force, and made prisoners of war, March 4, 1798.

The illustrious Gen. Greene, was detached to the southward, to counteract this formidable expedition. Lord Cornwallis penetrated into South-Carolina, and the cavalry attached to the expedition, under the command of Lieut. Col. Tarlton, scoured and ravaged the country.

At this time the affairs of America had again become desperate. The hard winter of 1780, set in with all its severity, immediately upon the departure of the expedition; and the privations and distresses of the army under Gen. Washington, were inexpressible through the winter and spring; a mutiny ensued, and the cause of liberty was in danger of being lost forever.

Gen. Greene wrote to Gen. Washington from Maryland, that, "the want of money, supplies, horses, &c. would render it impossible to provide for the march of the Maryland troops." These embarrassments greatly retarded the southern operations.

During this distressing period, the young marquis La Fayette, arrived at head quarters, from France; the tidings he brought gave new spirits to Gen. Washington, and to congress. On his passage from Boston to France, he narrowly escaped a conspiracy, formed to assassinate him, by some British sailors on board the ship. Through his personal efforts in France, he negotiated for America, supplies adapted to her wants; and announced that a fleet and armament would soon follow him from France.

Congress resolved, "that bills be immediately drawn on Dr. Franklin, minister at Paris, for twenty-five thousand dollars, and on Mr. Jay, minister at Madrid, for twenty-five thousand dollars, and the money applied to the immediate benefit of the armies."

The darkness which hung over the political horizon of America, was dispelled by this auspicious event; extensive arrangements were made to fill up the armies by regulars, and militia, and supplies were extensively collected. At the same time, the arms of Lord Cornwallis spread terror and consternation throughout the southern states; South Carolina fell in regular succession, into a state of submission to the arms of the conqueror, and its inhabitants were acknowledged and protected as British subjects, under a regular government.

During these operations, Sir Henry Clinton set sail for New York with part of the forces, and left Lord Cornwallis with 4000 regulars, to finish the conquest of the South. Upon the capture of Gen. Lincoln, Gen. Gates, then in Virginia, was appointed to succeed him, and immediately repaired to his command.

Amongst the distressing embarrassments of the nation at this time, the depreciated paper money was not one of the least : to obviate this, Congress called in by taxes, two hundred millions of dollars and burnt it, and redeemed it by a new emission at the rate of one dollar for twenty. This plan succeeded, and thousands of the best patriots of the nation were ruined by the depreciated redemption of a currency, they had endeavoured to support at par. At this time Mr. Adams left London (where he had been sent in 1776 to negotiate a peace,) and went by the way of Spain to Holland, to bring to a close the plans of alliance and commerce, which had been two years in agitation.

Lord Cornwallis having overrun South Carolina, and settled a system of government, began to penetrate into North Carolina. The troops under Gen. Gates were so miserably supplied with men and stores, that they maintained a feeble resistance, and with an army of four thousand, (less than one thousand of which were continental troops,) he directed his march for Camden in North Carolina.

Lord Cornwallis having reached Camden the day before, (unknown to the general) concentrated an attack upon general Gates in the night, in his camp at Clermont. At the same time, both armies began their march, viz. about half past 2 o'clock in the morning. Their advance parties met in the woods : a conflict ensued—upon the first shock the Americans fell into some disorder ; this was soon recovered, and skirmishing continued through the night ; when the morning appeared, both parties being informed of their situation by their captives, anxiously waited the issue.

An action soon commenced ; the field was contested with various success ; the bayonets of the British carried the day ; the regular troops were firm, but the militia fled, and dispersed as they fled—never to be recovered. The general and his regulars were abandoned to their fate.

Several parties of militia, who were advancing to join the army, turned their arms against the fugitives, and thus completed the overthrow. The pursuit continued for more than twenty miles, and the road was strewed with the fragments of this routed army, the wounded, the dead, and the dying. Such was the general panic through the neighboring country, that a party of horse, supported by more than one hundred infantry, and at the distance of more than eighty miles from the scene of action, upon the first intelligence, sought safety by flight.

The losses of his lordship, his want of supplies, and the sickly season, all constrained him to give over his pursuit, and remain at Camden, and pursue his plan of forcing and organizing the submission of the state of North Carolina; the more effectually to accomplish this, he seized all such principal characters as were firm to their country, and sent them prisoners to Charleston and St. Augustine, and secured their effects.

CHAP. XL.

Revolution continued to the capture of Lord Cornwallis at York Town, October, 1781.

THE cavalry under Col. Tarlton continued to ravage the country, burning, plundering, and destroying all in their way, sparing neither whig nor tory. Operations continued by detached parties, and with some success to the Americans.— Lord Cornwallis made a retrograde movement to strengthen his position, and general Gates put forth all his efforts to collect an army to oppose him; but his efforts were not very successful; he moved from Hillsborough, and took up his head quarters at Charlotte. At this time general Greene arrived, disclosing his commission from his excellency general Washington, and took the command; general Gates retired, and the distresses of North Carolina continued.

During these operations at the southward, great and perplexing difficulties had nearly ruined the army under general Washington. The frequent changes in the army, owing to short enlistments, the want of discipline amongst the raw troops, the want of pay, clothing, provisions, &c. had repeatedly distressed the army, and were at last accompanied with the revolt of the whole Pennsylvania line.

In defiance to all the efforts of general Wayne, and all the other officers, they seized on six pieces of artillery, took up their march, and repaired to Princeton. Sir Henry Clinton, upon the first intelligence, made some important movements from Staten Island, and sent spies at the same time to countenance and encourage the revolt in his name, with very favorable proposals. This was not their object: they were patriotic, but determined to be heard.

A committee from Congress waited upon the mutineers, at Princeton, and by liberal assurances, endeavored to purchase their return to duty; general Washington sent a strong detachment to enforce obedience; and they returned to their duty. A general arrangement was made by Congress, to supply the armies, both by foreign and domestic aid and resources.

The war raged in the south with various success; general Greene took the command of only 2,307 men, without clothes, or magazines, and without discipline; subsisting on daily collections, in the heart of a disaffected country, and in the face of a victorious enemy.

Lord Cornwallis, on the receipt of a reinforcement of 1,500 men, commenced his operations, and advanced.—Col. Tarlton was detached, to dislodge general Morgan from his position at the Cowpens: he commenced his movements with his usual impetuosity, and traversed the country for several days, laying waste every thing in his course, until he arrived at Morgan's position: an action commenced with the same impetuosity, and with signal success—the Americans were dislodged, and thrown into disorder; but they rallied to the charge, and were victorious in their turn: Tarlton was defeated, his army routed and destroyed, his artillery and baggage captured; and he, with the mounted fugitives, fled to Lord Cornwallis, January 17, 1781.

This defeat roused up his lordship: he commenced a pursuit, and the operations were such, as the flight of the Americans, and the rapid pursuit of his lordship, through a country thinly settled, (without intermission,) would necessarily produce.

Gen. Greene had the address to harrass his lordship in his flight, and yet avoid a general action, until he halted at Guilford, near the confines of Virginia, and gave him battle. The movements were well concerted; and general Greene, with his 2000 men, had hopes of success, against his lordship's pursuing army, greatly superior.

The conflict was sharp: the militia gave way—the regulars were overpowered, and general Greene drew off his army in good order, took a strong position to collect the stragglers, and commenced his retreat. The severity of the action occasioned his lordship to make a hasty retrograde movement, to recover his losses.

During these movements, the murderous sword of civil war, raged between whig and tory, and threatened to depopulate the country. At this time general Clinton detached a fleet with 1,500 troops, which entered the Chesapeake, landed their forces, and began the most alarming depredations in Virginia: several efforts were made to dislodge them, but without effect. General Greene made a movement to return to North Carolina, and carry the war into what had now become the enemy's country.

He boldly advanced to Camden with his little army, and gave battle to Lord Rawdon, April, 1781: a desperate conflict ensued—victory for a long time held a doubtful balance: both parties withdrew, and left the field covered with the dead.

On the 28th of April, general Greene thus expressed himself to the French minister: “This distressed country, I am sure, cannot struggle much longer, without more effectual support; they must fall—and I fear their fall will sap the independence of America. We fight, get beaten, rise, and fight again—the whole country is one continued scene of blood and slaughter.”

After the battle of Camden, his lordship retired in his turn; general Greene advanced, carried the war into South Carolina, and by a desperate attack, was on the point of carrying by assault, the strong fortress of Ninety-six, the reduction of which would have recovered all South Carolina, except Charleston.

At this critical moment, appeared a reinforcement of one thousand seven hundred foot, and one hundred and fifty horse, which had arrived at Charleston, landed, and flew to the relief of the fortress. General Greene retired, and again invested his lordship in Camden; not being sufficiently strong to attack him, he made a movement towards Charleston; this induced his lordship to leave his position, and with a detachment retire to Charleston, August, 1781.

The war now raged in Virginia, under the command of general Phillips. The marquis La Fayette, with a small force, attempted to cover Richmond—but failed; and the British entered the capital. Lord Cornwallis, after the action at Guilford, left general Greene to pursue his southern expedition, and moved to Wilmington; from thence he commenced a rapid march to Richmond in Virginia, to join general Phillips, and at a blow, reduce the state to obedience. Phillips had died; but a reinforcement of 1,800 regulars joined his lordship at Richmond.

The command devolved on his lordship; and the young marquis La Fayette, with a little army of 3,000 men, was now destined to enter the lists with this victorious hero of the south.

Flushed with his triumphs, his lordship in his communication to sir Henry Clinton, thus expresses himself: "the boy cannot escape me." His lordship attempted to surprise the marquis and bring him to an action—but without effect: he, with great adroitness, eluded his wiles, and held him at bay, until he was reinforced by a detachment from the north, under general Wayne, and the baron Steuben; his lordship took up his quarters at Williamsburg, after having spread carnage, terror and desolation through the states of South Carolina and North Carolina, (for one thousand miles,) and planted his victorious standard in the heart of Virginia.

At the commencement of these operations in the south, a French fleet under the command of the chevalier de Turney, with 6,000 men, under the command of count Rochambeau, arrived at Newport, Rhode-Island, July 10, 1780. The town was illuminated, and the illustrious allies were received with every expression of respect, and grateful applause. This was the fleet promised by the marquis La Fayette, when he returned from France, and which he had been the great instrument of procuring.

In the month of September, a conference was proposed by general Washington, to the French commander at Newport, and they met at Hartford, in Connecticut. General Washington was accompanied with the young marquis La Fayette, and general Knox. The avowed object of conference was, to concert measures for an attack upon the city of New-York.

In the midst of this conference, an express arrived from the fortress at West-Point, on the Hudson, announcing the traitorous designs of general Arnold. The council was closed—the parties retired to their posts, and general Washington flew to the relief of West-Point. On his arrival, he found the cannon dismantled, and the fortress dismantled; Arnold had fled, and taken refuge on board a British sloop of war, posted for the occasion.

Whilst his excellency was employed in repairing the fortress, a prisoner was announced, who proved to be the unfortunate major Andre, who had volunteered his services to sir Henry Clinton, to negociate this treacherous operation with general Arnold. His character was that of a spy, his fate was death! The righteous sacrifice greatly interested the feelings, and touched the sympathy of every American breast.

In May, 1781, Gen. Washington, with his suite, again met the French officers at Wethersfield, (Conn.) to mature the plans of the last year. His excellency, at the close of the consultation, repaired to head-quarters, and commenced his system of operations, to reduce the city of New-York. An attack was contemplated by land, whilst the French fleet should blockade the city by sea. To this end, the French troops were landed at Newport, and proceeded to New-York: heavy cannon and mortars, left at the siege of Boston, in 1776, were transported at great expense, across the country to the Hudson river, and down to the army before New-York.

The public feeling was alive to the enterprise—the British collected their fleet, fortified the port and city of New-York, and put themselves in the best possible state of defence: the American army was strengthened by drafts of militia; and upon the arrival of the French troops to join general Washington, the French fleet at Newport, (having been reinforced from France,) put to sea.

In New-York, all was anxiety and alarm, and a momentary attack was expected. At this critical moment, general Washington, with the best troops of the army, in conjunction with the French troops, made a rapid movement into New-Jersey, and to Philadelphia: the first regular intelligence of his movement, announced the allied army at the head of the river Elk, and the next, announced his arrival before York Town in Virginia, where lord Cornwallis had retired upon a junction of general Washington, with the Marquis La Fayette.

At this critical juncture, the English fleet, stationed to protect his lordship, had slipped their cables upon the approach of the French fleet, met them at the mouth of the Chesapeake, been beaten in a severe action, and fled to New-York. The victorious French sailed up the bay to co-operate with the allies, in the reduction of York-Town.

The town was invested, and the trenches were opened on the 6th of October: the approaches were regular, the cannonade terrible, and the resistance desperate. The overwhelming destruction which bore down, wasted and destroyed the British, forced his lordship to request a parley on the 18th, and on the 19th, the articles of capitulation were signed, and his lordship, with his whole army, marched out, prisoners of war, October 20th, 1781. Thus fell this hero of the south, by a stratagem concerted at Hartford and Wethersfield, (Connecticut.)

CHAP. XLI.

General affairs of America, to the adoption and organization of the Federal Constitution, March, 1789—remarks.

HIS Excellency General Washington closed the glorious scene at York Town, by publishing in general orders, the grateful effusions of his heart to the army, both officers and soldiers, and ordered the whole to be assembled in brigades and divisions, to attend divine service, and render thanks to that God who had given them the victory.

Congress next passed a vote of thanks to general Washington, count Rochambeau, count Degrasse, the officers of the different corps, and the men under their command: appointed a day of general thanksgiving to Almighty God, throughout United America; and moved in procession to the Dutch Lutheran church, and returned thanks to God, for this distinguished success.

All United America resounded with grateful acclamations of joy, and every breast glowed with the warmest emotions of gratitude to the God of their fathers.

Congress ordered a marble column to be erected in York-Town, adorned with emblems commemorative of the French and American alliance, and an inscription, expressing the surrender of the British arms.

The several corps returned to their former stations, and his excellency general Washington repaired to Philadelphia, to give repose to his mind, and to confer with congress upon the future exigencies of the nation.

The French fleet, under count Degrasse, sailed for the West-Indies on the 5th of November, and the operations of the seasons were generally closed. Virginia, North-Carolina, and all South-Carolina, excepting Charleston, were recovered, and general order restored.

The theatre of war was now removed to the West-Indies, where France and Spain assembled a fleet of sixty ships of the line, and spread a general alarm throughout the British islands. This was opposed by a British fleet of equal force. One of the most desperate and sanguinary conflicts ensued then ever known, between the French under count Degrasse, and the English under sir George Rodney. Sir George under a press of sail, bore down upon the French lines; the French nailed their colors to their masts, and fought with desperation. Admiral Degrasse fought his ship, until only two men with himself remained, and then struck his colors. The English were victorious. The French suffered the loss of three thousand killed, and twice as many wounded—the English suffered severely. This action was decisive in those seas, and the remains of the French and Spanish fleets withdrew.

Congress pursued the plan of loans from France, Spain and Holland to prosecute the war: and through their ministers, liberal supplies were obtained. All further operations in South Carolina ceased, and Charleston was evacuated on the 14th of December, 1782, with the most perfect order, and in two days the regular police of the city, and the government of the state were restored. The French troops, rendered so illustrious at the siege of York Town, now took up their march for Boston, where they embarked for France.

We pass over the efforts of Spain to recover Gibraltar, after the conquest of Minorca, together with all further naval operations.

The subject of peace now became general in Europe and America. Negotiations were opened at Paris under Dr. Franklin and John Jay, as ministers of America; and the count de Aranda, minister of Spain; and the count de Vergennes on the part of France; with Mr. Fitzherbert and Mr. Oswald, on the part of Great Britain. Mr. Adams was at this time negotiating a commercial treaty with Holland.

Many points labored; the negotiation spun out: the English ministers could not be prevailed on to take the starting point, and acknowledge the independence of America, until they had sent to England, and received positive instructions.

The fisheries next labored with England, and France did not favor all the American demands upon this point. During this struggle in this council, Mr. Adams left Holland, at the request of Mr. Jay, and repaired to Paris; and upon a consultation, they agreed to negotiate with the British minister separately, if the count de Vergennes did not yield to the American claims on the fisheries, &c. This movement succeeded and brought the negotiations to a favorable close.

At this critical juncture, a new scene opened to the general in chief. The army before New-York became infected with a general mutiny, founded upon a demand for arrearages of pay, and adequate indemnification for their services and sufferings, with sufficient guarantee, before they were disbanded. The general, alarmed at this dangerous conspiracy, requested the general and field officers, with one officer from each company, and a proper representation from the staff of the army, to assemble on Saturday the 15th. He at the same time used all his influence to soften the violence of their passions.

According to appointment the officers met, general Gates was appointed president: his excellency general Washington addressed the council in a short, but a most pathetic and dignified speech, which touched their honors, their interest, and their hearts. They voted an address of thanks to his excellency, and retired, relying with full confidence on the assurances of his excellency, and the wisdom and liberality of congress: the mutiny was quelled.

On the 24th of March, it was announced in congress, by a letter from the marquis la Fayette, bearing date Feb. 5, that a general peace had been signed at Paris.

Congress settled the requirements of the army to their satisfaction, and they were disbanded. On the 4th of April the treaty arrived in America; general rejoicings resounded through the country. On the 25th of November, the British evacuated the city of New-York, and the Americans took possession with great dignity and good order. His excellency general Washington with his principal officers, the governor of New-York, &c. advanced in procession, attended by a vast concourse of people. The ceremony was conducted with great solemnity, and did honor to the occasion.

When the festivity and hilarity of this interesting scene were closed, his excellency general Washington took an affectionate leave of the officers, who were his companions in arms, retired to Philadelphia, and exhibited his accounts to the controller, in his own hand writing. He then retired to Annapolis, where Congress were then sitting (by adjournment,) and on the 20th of December, 1783, resigned his commission as commander in chief. Congress being assembled, and the house and galleries crowded by a numerous and splendid collection of ladies and gentlemen; his excellency, agreeable to appointment, and by notice from the president, arose from his seat, and with the dignity of himself, addressed the house in an appropriate speech.

Thus closed the greatest revolution that had ever been undertaken, accompanied with the greatest displays of wisdom, patience, fortitude, disinterested patriotism and feats of arms, ever before recorded, and with a general success, un contemplated by the most sanguine sons of liberty.

The liberty of America was now sealed, by the resignation of that illustrious chief, who had been the instrument in the hand of God, of obtaining and securing all her blessings, and on whose sword hung the destinies of America. The father of his country retired to his seat in Virginia, there to enjoy in the bosom of repose, the prayers and benedictions of a free and grateful people.

The general interest of the nation claimed, and received the unremitting efforts of congress, to give credit to the paper medium, (now almost a cypher by depreciation)—to satisfy the claims of the army, and the creditors generally—to strengthen the union, by securing credit at home, and confidence abroad.

The individual states pursued the same plans, extended their commerce, and improved their agriculture, and a general tranquillity prevailed. Several of the states, by legislative acts, infringed such articles of the treaty as regarded the payment of British debts, which gave to Great-Britain a pretext for infringing that part of the treaty, which related to her relinquishing the military posts on the western frontier: these became subjects of collision.

It was early foreseen after the war, that the national compact was too feeble to secure the tranquillity of the states; two events rendered this evident to all. It became the interest of the nation, that congress should lay a national impost, to increase the revenue for the general good. This was acceded to by all the states, except Rhode-Island; her negative put a veto upon the measure; the impost failed:—congress could only recommend, but had no powers to enforce. About the same time, an insurrection broke out in the state of Massachusetts, under captain Daniel Shays, which became highly alarming, and threatened the destruction of liberty and the laws.

These two important events called up the attention of the states to their general interest : they unanimously resolved, in their general assemblies, by the recommendation of congress, to call a convention, to be held at Philadelphia, to frame a constitution, which should more effectually secure the peace and prosperity of the nation.

The delegates were chosen by all the states, and assembled at Philadelphia, May, 1787. The father of his country, as delegate from Virginia, was unanimously elected president of the convention. A constitution was framed—received the signatures of the convention, and was transmitted to the states for their approbation and acceptance.

Conventions of the several states were assembled ; the constitution was regularly discussed, and adopted by a majority. His excellency George Washington was elected president, by the unanimous suffrages of his country, and the honorable John Adams, vice-president. Members of a new congress were regularly chosen by all the states—assembled at New-York, regularly organized, March 4, and his excellency president Washington, with great solemnity, was inducted into office, April 30, 1789.

The government was organized, and became responsible for the interests of the nation. He who had shone so conspicuous in the field, added a new lustre to his name, by his wisdom in the cabinet.

With the new government, sprang up new energies throughout the nation ; union, peace, concord, public confidence, public and private credit ; a spirit of agriculture, commerce and enterprise, universally prevailed ; a foundation was laid for all that unrivalled prosperity America has enjoyed, and all that greatness she is destined to enjoy.

Here let us pause, and admire the wisdom and goodness of the God of our fathers, in his watchful, guardian care, over this vine of the reformation, this little church in the wilderness. If they had not been harrassed by the savages in their early settlements, would they have preserved their virtue ? If they had not been pressed by the alarming dangers of the old French war ; would they have ever united ? If they had not been oppressed by Britain ; would they have become a nation? If they had not been alarmed by insurrections under the old confederation; would they have delegated such powers to the new federal compact? If the new federal compact had not been framed and put into operation just at that critical time, just upon the explosion of the French revolution; who will dare to say, what would have been the fate of United America at this day? Let us adore the God of our fathers, who has done all this for us.

CHAP. XLII.

Affairs of America continued—war with France—peace—war with England—peace—war with the Barbary powers—general peace, 1815—general remarks.

WE have noticed that auspicious day, the 4th of March, 1789, when the father of his country, as President of the United States of America, gave the first energies to that federal compact, which has proved the palladium of the liberty and prosperity of the nation.

On the 5th of May following, commenced that terrible explosion, the French revolution, which overthrew the religion and government of France, subverted almost every throne in christendom, and threatened the peace and liberty of America. To this compact, under God, America is indebted, for all that peace and prosperity she has been able to maintain through this mighty struggle; for her successes in the war with France, 1799, and her late war with England, during this distressing period.

The war with France was short, and of too little moment to claim particular attention. The late war with England commenced in 1812, and closed February, 1815, was serious in its operations—eventful in its consequences, and claims some particular notice.

The collisions of France and England with the commercial interests of America, excited a warmth of feeling in America, and a spirit of hostility against both nations; this was expressed by congress, according to the strength and predominancy of the two great parties in our national councils; remonstrances produced negotiations, the fluctuating state of Europe, rendered negotiations critical and doubtful.

When the emperor Napoleon commenced his career of conquest—when all Europe were alive to the events of the day—the American government embraced the favorable moment to redress the wrongs she had so long and so patiently endured from British depredation on her commerce, and the rights of the American flag.—They proclaimed war against England, and at a blow, attempted the conquest of the Canadas; it failed, and the war became a naval war.

Great-Britain prepared to secure her possessions in the Canadas, by powerful armaments on the lakes; America continued her operations against the Canadas, and prepared to meet her on the water; she at the same time commenced general depredations upon the commerce of England, with privateers and frigates, and the contest became sharp and bloody.

The English government sent their ships of war and frigates on to the American coast, with full confidence that the small naval force of America would soon be overpowered and destroyed. The Americans sent their cruisers and frigates into every sea, and every clime, with high confidence and distinguished success. The particular operations of this war, upon the water, claim some notice.

On the 21st of June, 1812, (three days after war was declared,) an American squadron of two frigates and two sloops of war, under commodore Rogers, sailed from New-York on a cruise. On the 13th August, the United States frigate Essex of 44 guns, commanded by captain Porter, fell in with and captured his Britannic Majesty's sloop of war Alert, of 20 guns, after an action of eight minutes. On the 19th of August the United States frigate Constitution, of 44 guns, captain Hull, fell in with and captured his Britannic Majesty's frigate Guerriere, of 38 guns, James Dacres, commander, after an action of twenty-five minutes. The Guerriere lost fifteen men killed and sixty-four wounded; the Constitution had seven killed and seven wounded.

At this time the government of Algiers commenced depredations upon the American commerce in the Mediterranean, and captured the brig Edwin of Salem. October 18th, the United States sloop of war Wasp, of 16 guns, captain Jones, fell in with his Britannic Majesty's sloop of war Frolic, of 18 guns, captain Wyngates, and captured her in forty-three minutes; the Frolic had thirty killed and fifty wounded; the Wasp had five killed, and five wounded.

His Britannic majesty's ship of war the Poictiers, of seventy-four guns, fell in with and captured the Wasp and her prize soon after the action. October 25, the United States frigate, United States, of forty-four guns, commodore Decatur, fell in with, and captured his Britannic Majesty's frigate Macedonian of 38 guns, J. S. Carden commander, after an action of one hour and thirty minutes; the Macedonian lost thirty-six killed, and sixty-eight wounded; the United States five killed and seven wounded. December 29th, the United States frigate Constitution, 44 guns, Commodore Bainbridge, fell in with and captured his Britannic Majesty's frigate Java, of thirty-four guns, captain Lambert, after an action of fifty-five minutes; the Java lost sixty-nine killed, and one hundred and one wounded; the Constitution nine killed, and twenty-five wounded.

During these operations on the water, the Americans were unsuccessful in all their land operations against Canada, and the war on that side wore an unfavorable aspect. February 24, 1813, the United States sloop of war Hornet, of sixteen guns, captain Lawrence, fell in with and captured his Britannic Majesty's brig Peacock of eighteen guns, captain Peake, after an action of 15 minutes; the Peacock had 33 wounded which were saved with the prisoners of the crew; but the killed, with their captain went down with the Peacock; the Hornet lost 1 killed, 4 wounded, and 3 sunk in the prize.

August.—At this time, the skirmishing on lake Ontario commenced with various success; the Creek and Choctaw Indians, began their depredations with success; and the English blockaded the ports south of the Chesapeake bay, under sir J. B. Warren. September 3—the U. S. brig Enterprise of 16 guns, captain Burrows, fell in with and captured his Britannic majesty's brig Boxer, of 18 guns, captain Blythe, after an action of 45 minutes; the loss of the Enterprise 9—the Boxer lost 45; both captains fell in the action.

The limits of this work will not permit me to pursue this brilliant scene of naval war, and shew, in detail, the capture of his Britannic majesty's frigates Cyane and Levant, by the United States frigate Constitution, in a desperate action; of his Britannic majesty's frigate Penguin of thirty-two guns, by the United States sloop of war Hornet; of his Britannic majesty's brig Epervier, of eighteen guns, by the United States sloop of war Peacock; of his Britannic majesty's sloop of war Reindeer, by the United States sloop of war Wasp; or of his Britannic majesty's brigs Lettice and Bon Accord, and sloop of war Avon, by the Wasp : the last of which, sunk immediately after the action.

These captures were the result of close action, in sharp and desperate conflicts ; many of these prizes, were stripped of every spar, and several so cut to pieces, as to become unmanageable, and were burnt at sea ; others sunk in the action, or immediately after.

The general movements for the reduction of Canada, were now completed ; the fleets on lake Erie, and lake Ontario, were now about equal in numbers and force, and prepared for action. The American forces under the command of Gen. Harrison, moved towards Detroit, and an action commenced on Lake Erie, between the American fleet, under the command of Com. Perry, and the British fleet under the command of commodore Barclay, Sept. 10th.

The fleets were equal : commodore Barclay, an old distinguished officer, in the school of Nelson, had seen much service ; commodore Perry, a young officer, and without experience. The conflict commenced—the action was general and desperate—commodore Perry's ship being disabled he changed his flag, on board another ship, in an open boat, in the heat of the action, and at once bore down with the remainder of his fleet upon the enemy : both fleets were close engaged—the action was short—the carnage was terrible, and the whole British squadron surrendered to commodore Perry. Two ships, two brigs, one sloop, and one schooner, were the trophies of his victory.

The British, upon the news of this victory, evacuated Detroit, and retired to Malden, in Upper Canada. Gen. Harrison took possession of Detroit, Sept. 28th, and pursued into Canada. The illustrious Perry joined him, and became his companion in arms. Gen. Harrison gained a victory over Gen. Proctor, in Upper Canada, with distinguished advantage ; and captured and destroyed his whole army, Oct. 5. At the same time, com. Chauncey took and destroyed seven of the British squadron on lake Ontario.

Nov. 4th.—Overtures for peace arrived from England : at the same time Gen. Wilkinson arrived, and took command of the expedition into Canada. The operations continued with various success, through the month of December, and both armies took up their winter quarters.

Feb. 1814.—The U. States frigate President, commodore

Rogers, arrived after a cruise of seventy days. The United States frigate Essex, of thirty-two guns, captain Porter, which had sailed early in the war, on a cruise to South America, took several valuable prizes on the coast of Brazil, doubled Cape Horn, and cruised with great success on the coast of Chili and Peru; captured and destroyed the British whale ships in those seas, and repaired to the bay of Valparaiso, on the coast of Chili, to obtain supplies; here she was overtaken and blockaded by a superior British force, consisting of the frigate Phœbe, of thirty-six guns, and the sloop of war Cherub, of twenty-two guns, and was captured, after an action of two hours and a half.

At this time Gen. Jackson took vengeance on the Creek Indians, for their predatory ravages. July 3.—The operations against Canada were now commenced. August.—A British squadron entered the Potomac, proceeded up to the city of Washington, landed a body of British troops, took the city, burnt the Capitol, President's house, &c. and retired, and plundered Alexandria; from thence they proceeded to Baltimore, and after an unsuccessful attack, were compelled to retire.

Sept. 11.—The town of Plattsburg was assaulted by a land force from Lower Canada, under the command of Gen. Prevost, and a formidable naval force, under the command of commodore Downie. The harbor of Plattsburgh was defended by the American squadron, under the command of com. Macdonough. The merits of this action, so glorious to the American navy, may be seen by the following official report of commodore Macdonough.

U. S. ship Saratoga, off Plattsburgh, Sept. 11, 1814.

Sir,—The Almighty has been pleased to grant us a signal victory on Lake Champlain, in the capture of one frigate, one brig, and two sloops of war.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

Sir your most obedient servant,

T. MACDONOUGH.

HON. WILLIAM JONES,

Secretary of the Navy.

This signal victory, obliged General Prevost to retire with a rapid movement; the American troops pursued, and he returned into Canada. The operations on the lines continued with various success. The British invaded the city of New-Orleans with a formidable force, with a view to make a conquest of Louisiana; but were repulsed in a signal victory by general Jackson, and abandoned the enterprise, January 8, 1815. On the 11th February, the treaty of peace with Great Britain arrived, and closed the conflict. All things returned into their former state. February 18, the treaty was ratified and peace was established.

On the 2d of March, 1815, war was declared by the American government against Algiers, and a squadron of eleven frigates and armed vessels, was dispatched to the Mediterranean, in two divisions, under commodores Bainbridge and Decatur; and in four months, all the Barbary powers were united in treaties of peace with the United States; our own captives, and those of several European states, released, and expressions of submission from several of those powers obtained, not hitherto contemplated, and such as had never been extorted by any other nation. A just tribute to the American flag.

Religion, patriotism and valor, supported by industry and economy, joined to resolution, perseverance and enterprise, marked the character of our fathers: these virtues combined, made this western wilderness blossom like the rose, and this savage desert become vocal with the praises of our God; led them to resolve, that as the bible was the standard of their religious faith and practice, they would take the bible for the standard of their civil government, until they could find a better.

Under this standard, they planted a system of religious, civil and literary institutions, the most free, pure and perfect ever before known; protected by a system of military discipline, the most independent in the support of that all important military principle, true merit, ever before witnessed; the whole, supported by that balance of power in the three departments of government, unknown to all former republics; a balance of power which originated in the Saxon heptarchy in the fifth century—was greatly improved by Alfred the great, in the ninth century—and has been completed in America.

Upon this inestimable basis, stands the illustrious republic of United America. The success of these systems, stands unrivalled in the annals of time, and so long as they are preserved in their purity, will continue to stand unrivalled, until they are eclipsed by the glories of the great millennial day.

All the literature of the ancients, together with all the extensive improvements of the moderns, in the arts and sciences have flourished in America, and equalled, if not surpassed the learning of Europe. The manufactures of America are yet in their infancy; although her improvements have been flattering, she can never excel, so long as an unbounded forest invites to distant enterprise, and promises a rich reward to the hardy sons of labor.

The agriculture of America has kept pace with her general improvements; her inventive genius shines conspicuous; and her enterprise on the ocean, has rendered her the second commercial nation in the world. Her naval glory stands unrivalled, and the late war with England has evinced to the world, that America has stripped the laurel from the brow of the mistress of the seas.

The most distinguished features in the American character, are displayed in that unshaken virtue which formed her national republican compact: a compact which has so balanced the independent sovereignties of the several states, as to give the most flattering assurances that states may be multiplied to any extent, even to overspread the whole northern continent, and yet our free elective government be supported, and the free independent republics preserved.

Let every American cherish the religion and virtues of our forefathers; cultivate and preserve their habits, manners and customs, together with their wise and virtuous institutions; remembering, that these are the basis of all our boasted acquirements and enjoyments: that when we abandon these, we abandon the God of our fathers, the vine which he has planted, and desert the standard of the church in the wilderness. We may then take up our lamentation, with an eternal adieu to all our greatness, to all our peace, to all our boasted enjoyments. We shall then add one more example to the many already gone before us, that republican liberty without virtue, is dead. We shall then have a master, and that master must be a despot.*

SKETCHES OF

PART THIRD.

CHAP. I.

Causes that led to the French Revolution ; causes that led to the great events which controlled it ; northern confederation against Sweden ; the rise of Peter I. ; rise of Charles XII. ; character of Sweden, Russia, Denmark and Poland—invasion of Denmark, and peace—siege of Narva ; battle of Narva ; battle of the Dwina ; intrigues of Charles XII. in Poland ; character of the Polish nation and government ; intrigues of the Archbishop of Gnesna—distracted state of Poland.

THAT bright luminary of the west, the reformation, which had in some degree illumined all the states of Europe, amidst the bloody and cruel persecutions of the popes, and the creatures of the papal church : and enjoyed the protecting power of Henry VIII. of England, Henry the IVth. of France, and Queen Elizabeth of England ; and had triumphed over the vindictive malice of Philip the II. of Spain, and the overbearing hauteur, and exterminating persecution of Lewis XIV. of France, and had seen the true church happily planted in America ; was now destined to witness new and sanguinary scenes, to endure new and sanguinary sufferings, and experience the triumphs of her enemies.—Enemies, more fatal to the church than the whole catalogue of two hundred and sixty popes, and more vindictive against the reformation, than the thirty-eight papal despots, who have flourished since the days of Luther.—Enemies, who combined all the violent subtlety of the disciples of Ignatius Loyola, (that saint of Gregory XV.) with all the arch malice and venom of the school of modern philosophers, and who attacked her with the whole host of infidelity, under the masked assault of reason, philosophy, and illuminatism; armed a great nation by a desperate and destructive revolution, to rifle her temples, violate her altars, pillage and butcher her friends, and by one solemn national decree, announce "there is no God, and death is an eternal sleep."

The regular and progressive order of things in Europe, which paved the way to this eventual crisis, together with the means which at the same time were regularly progressing to control it, claim some particular notice.

The great conflicts which sprang up in the south of Europe, at the commencement of the eighteenth century, and which drenched the south in blood, by the lust of dominion, pride, subtlety, intrigue, luxury and corruption, paved the way for the gratification of that black catalogue of passions which flow from the total depravity of the human heart, and under the mask of science and refinement, opened the theatre of a twenty years war, and threatened the extermination of the very name of religion.

The first symptom of this sanguinary scene appeared, when Lewis XV. interfered in the quarrel of the Jansenists, and Jesuits; the violence of the parliament shewed that the poison had begun to work, and the attempt on the life of the king was a specimen of the same subtle and vindictive malice that destroyed Henry IV. and rendered the abolition of the order of Jesuits absolutely necessary.

The demon of subtlety and discord then assumed a new form, and continued to work with the same means, under a new name, until it again drenched the world in blood, and was constrained to languish under the rod which its own violence and excesses had raised up to check and control it. When and how God had prepared this rod of correction, claims our next attention.

In detailing the great events of Europe in succession, we noticed the mighty conflict in the north, which sprang up in the reign of Lewis XIV. of France, between Russia, Poland and Denmark, with Sweden; passed over the operations and events of this war, and left them for this place, as being more immediately connected with the great subject of this part of our work.

The long and distressing reigns of Lewis XIV. and XV. had kindled a fire of ambition in the breast of man, which had given a polish to his manners, a brilliancy to the arts, and a lustre to his arms, which far surpassed former ages, and which the states of the north had not acquired.

That God, who renders his means always adequate to his ends, had now raised up a bright constellation in the north, which should enable their dignity and improvements to vie with the south. The two champions of this northern constellation, were Peter I. of Russia, and Charles XII. of Sweden.

In 1696, Peter had rendered his arms illustrious, in his war with the Turks, particularly in the acquisition of Asoph, and the dominion of the Black Sea. Flushed with the acquisitions of this war, he resolved to make Russia the centre of trade for all that northern world—to this end he contemplated a city upon the Baltic, and a chain of water communication, from thence to the Black Sea, to the Caspian Sea, to Archangel on the North Sea, and to China.

To accomplish these great objects, he sent three ambassadors into the south of Europe, to the courts of England, France and Holland, and followed in their train as a private gentleman. He passed into Holland; there he entered the dock yards, and served as a common laborer to learn the art of ship building: he passed over into England, where he was courteously received, and returned into Russia, carrying with him some carpenters from the dock-yards of England and Holland, and was master builder for the first ship built in Russia.

In his travels, he studied the arts and sciences generally; he studied men, manners and things, with a view of laying the foundation of the future greatness of his country.

The peace of Carlowitz closed the war with the Turks, and guaranteed to Peter the conquests upon the Black Sea. Fired with the successes of this war, his mind aspired to the dominion of the Baltic, to accomplish the whole extent of his ambitious plans. To this end, he entered into an alliance with the king of Denmark, then Frederick II. and with the king of Poland, then Augustus, elector of Saxony, to seize on the dominions of Charles XII. the young king of Sweden. By this blow, Peter hoped to open a way to the ocean, through the sovereignty of the Baltic, and establish the uncontrouled commerce of his new capital. All this was masked, under the pretext of recovering the territory of his ancestors, particularly the provinces of Ingria and Livonia.

The dominions of Peter, at this time, embraced the whole north eastern section of the continent of Europe, together with the whole northern section of Asia, extending from the shores of the Baltic on the west, to the ocean on the north, and the Pacific ocean on the east; the most extensive, and the most barbarous empire on the earth, and now under the sovereign dominion of one of the greatest and most ambitious monarchs.

Sweden, which was the Scandinavia of the ancients, (or Gothland,) from whence issued the swarms of those tribes which overwhelmed the western Roman empire, had been distinguished for its heroes, and the love of liberty, until it fell under the dominion of Denmark, in the reign of Margaret, 1492, and the distresses which ensued upon the division and intrigues of Christern, king of Denmark, and Upsal, archbishop and primate of the kingdom, a creature of the pope.

These oppressions roused up the nation to a sense of their wrongs: when Gustavus Vasa, a prince from the ancient kings of Sweden, who had been driven into obscurity by the revolutions of his suffering country, and in the character of a peasant, had been immured in the mines of Sweden; burst from his long concealment; disclosed his character to his countrymen; put himself at their head; with his sword took vengeance on his enemies, and restored the liberty of his country. Gustavus took vengeance on the creatures of the pope; exterminated the papal religion, and established the reformation of Luther, which continues to be the religion of Sweden.

Gustavus Adolphus, his son and successor, styled the great, protected the reformation in the heart of Germany, humbled the house of Austria, and made the pope tremble upon his throne. In the midst of his triumphs, he crowned the battle of Lutzen with his illustrious death, and was succeeded by Christiana, who did nothing more than to evince to the world, that she was unworthy of the crown of Sweden, appoint her successor, and resign her crown to Charles Gustavus.

He, like his ancestor Gustaphus Adolphus, was illustrious in arms, and died young, in the midst of successful enterprise, and left his crown to Charles XI. who also was distinguished in arms, died early, and left his crown to the immortal Charles XII.

Charles succeeded to the throne of this illustrious line of ancestors, at fifteen years of age, in the year of 1699, the same year that Peter the I. returned from his travels, and formed the design of dismembering his kingdom. The heroes of this distinguished dynasty, had trained the hardy Swedes to war; and their spirit of liberty, joined to the principles of the reformation, had rendered their victorious arms illustrious on the fields of Germany, and inspired their neighbors with a high sense of their valor.

Augustus, king of Poland, at this time, was seated upon a throne rendered splendid by the high polish of his own personal elegance, address and manners; his kingdom was under the full power of the feudal system. Augustus was but the shadow of a king, the nobility held the power.

Denmark was governed by Frederic II. in possession of Norway, and claiming the sovereignty of one half of Sweden; possessing the spirit of those ancestors, whose depredations we have so often witnessed in England and France, and who was now leagued with Peter and Augustus, to dismember the kingdom of Sweden, during the early age of the young king, Charles XII. He began the war by invading the duchy of Holstein, then owned jointly by the duke of Holstein, and his brother-in-law Charles XII.—1700.

Upon the first tidings of the war, the senate of Sweden were assembled, and the young king appeared in the midst of his council. During the all important deliberations, all eyes were fixed on him; he was cool, thoughtful, and silent. When impatience was ready to distract the council, he exclaimed, "I will never begin an unjust war, nor end a just one, but with the destruction of my enemies"—immediately made the necessary arrangements, embarked his troops at Carlescroon, on board his fleet, set sail for Copenhagen, landed on the island of Zealand, and invested the city.

Upon the landing of the troops, Charles was the first on shore; and when he heard the whistling of the bullets from the Danes, who opposed his landing, he said to an officer who was near, "what noise is that in the air?" upon being answered, it is the whistling of bullets, he replied, "evermore let this be my music."

A deputation immediately attended the king from Copenhagen, beseeching him not to bombard their city—Charles, on horseback at the head of his troops, received them on their knees, and upon a promise to pay four thousand rix dollars, he granted their request, concluded a treaty, and in six weeks, Denmark was severed from the confederacy by an honorable peace, and the duke of Holstein indemnified for all his losses and expenses in the war.

During these operations, Peter the Czar, with the allies, entered the provinces of Livonia and Ingria; Peter laid siege to Narva, with eighty thousand men, and Augustus laid siege to Riga. Charles advanced to the relief of Narva, crossed the gulf of Riga, with fifteen thousand foot, and four thousand horse, and landed in Livonia. The Czar had opened his trenches in October, before Narva, with one hundred and fifty pieces of cannon, and eighty thousand men, with a reserve of thirty thousand, then on their march to join him at Narva.

The character of the Swedes had been formed, under the succession of heroes who had filled the Swedish throne, but the character of the Russians was yet to be formed. This army of the Czar, was rather an assembled multitude, than a regular army; composed of the peasantry of Russia, in a rude, savage, undisciplined state, many of them clad in the skins of wild beasts, armed with war clubs, and bows and arrows, few of them had fire arms, and were commanded by their chiefs, as unaccustomed to discipline as their soldiers.

The Czar had given the command of this army to a German general, the duke de Croix, on whose experience and abilities he had great confidence; and held, himself, the station of a lieutenant, for the double purpose of learning the military art, as he had learnt the ship carpenter's art, through the regular grades of service—and to set the example of subordination and discipline to the chiefs in his service, who had been accustomed to absolute sway, over their untutored slaves.

The Czar had posted 30,000 of this besieging army in advance from Narva, one league; and 20,000 more in advance of the former, in order to intercept the approach of Charles, to the relief of Narva; and 5,000 more, as an advance guard; and had gone himself to hasten the march of an army of 40,000 men, then on their way to join his army before Narva.

Charles resolved to attack the Czar in his camp, put himself at the head of 4,000 horse, and 4,000 light troops, and made a rapid movement to the relief of Narva.

Upon the approach of the king of Sweden, the advanced guard of the Russians, consisting of 5,000 men, fled; the rout, terror, and disorder of their flight, with the Swedes close at their heels, threw the 20,000 in their way into the same disorder : they in their flight, spread terror and consternation throughout the camp. These operations had given very little check to the advance of the king of Sweden : he now appeared before the Russian camp, well intrenched, and defended by one hundred and fifty pieces of cannon. Charles, resolved to avail himself of the general panic, advanced to the attack ; the Russians made a firm resistance ; the Swedes, having made a breach with their cannon in their intrenchments, advanced to the charge with fixed bayonets, favored by a violent snow storm, and overthrew all in their way. A terrible carnage ensued ; the Russians fled on all sides, and abandoned their camp, artillery and baggage : the rout and consternation became general : Charles, with his little troop, pursued to the river—the right wing in attempting to cross, broke down the bridge, and met with another overthrow in the river ; the left wing returned to their camp, where, after a slight defence, they all laid down their arms to the king of Sweden, who received their submission with great civility.

Charles detained only the general officers, and dismissed the remainder in the most courteous manner, supplied them with boats to cross the river, and they returned into Russia. Eighteen thousand Russians had fallen in their intrenchments, besides those that had fallen in their flight, and were drowned in the river : the Swedes lost but six hundred.

This almost unexampled overthrow, saved Russia : it taught Peter, that numbers, without discipline, would rather ruin, than save his country ; and he profited by the lesson. It inspired Charles with too much confidence in his own strength, and too much contempt for his enemies ; these two evils ruined his cause.

Charles, wrapt up in his cloak, threw himself upon the ground, (then covered with snow,) and gave himself a few hours repose. At break of day, he prepared to attack a body of 30,000 Russians, not yet subdued, when he received from their general, overtures of submission, with a request, that the king would grant them the same favor he had granted to the other captives : he sent his assurances, and the 30,000 laid down their arms, and the king received their submission with their heads uncovered, at the head of less than 7000 Swedes, sent them all free, back into their own country, and entered Narva in triumph. Here he treated the general officers of the Russians, who were detained as prisoners, with great liberality ; restored their swords, supplied them with money, and conducted with great modesty.

This overthrow, caused Augustus to raise the siege of Riga. The Czar received the news of the destruction of his army before Narva, when advancing by forced marches, with 40,000 men, to intercept the retreat of the king of Sweden, and in high expectation of enclosing him between the two armies, and thus sealing his ruin : he abandoned his enterprise, returned to Moscow, and devoted himself to the discipline of his army.

Upon the request of Augustus, they soon had an interview at Birsen, in Lithuania, to concert measures of general defence and safety ; and gave themselves up to dissipation fifteen days.

Charles passed the winter at Narva, and upon the opening of spring, appeared in Lithuania. The Saxons had taken the field under Mareschal Stenau, and Ferdinand, duke of Courland, and opposed his passage of the river Dwina.

Charles assembled his boats, and embarked his troops with a favorable wind ; at the same time he let off a great number of boats, filled with burning hay, straw, &c. ; this smoke blew over upon the enemy, and concealed the movements of the king. He passed in good order, and, as at Copenhagen, leapt into the water at the head of his troops, landed his cannon, and formed his army on shore before the smoke was sufficiently cleared away to give the Saxons opportunity to make resistance.

Mareschal Stenau, as soon as the air was cleared, lost not a moment ; he fell upon the Swedes with the flower of his cavalry ; the shock was violent ; the Swedes were broken, and fled into the river ; Charles, with great composure, recovered the shock, rallied his troops in the water, advanced to the charge, and recovered the plain.

An action commenced—the Saxons fought with great bravery, and the duke of Courland thrice penetrated into the king's guards, had two horses killed under him ; was repulsed, wounded, and carried off the field. The Saxons fled, and the king advanced to Mittau, the capital of Courland ; here he received the submission of the whole duchy.

He next marched into Lithuania, and formed the plan of deposing Augustus, king of Poland, through the intrigues of his own subjects. The operations and success of this intrigue, will give the best illustration of the strength and genius of the feudal government of Poland.

This kingdom was larger than France, watered with large and fine rivers, and possessed a rich and fertile soil ; but the natives were indolent, the nobility rich, and the peasantry slaves. The population of Poland was at that time greater than that of Sweden, but the character of the nation, and energies of the government very different, and far inferior.

The constitution of Poland was purely Gothic. Every gentleman might vote for the choice of a king, and even be chosen himself ; this general liberty of suffrage and election, exposed the crown always to the highest bidder. The nobility and clergy were independent of the crown ; but the peasantry were bought and sold like cattle upon the estates, and even their lives were at the disposal of their lords.

In the midst of this wretchedness, the Poles were proud of their liberty, and of their republic ; and gloried in the title of electors of kings, and destroyers of tyrants. The very seeds of discord, riot and rebellion, were sown in the constitution of Poland ; and at the coronation of the king, he absolved his subjects from their allegiance, upon his infringing the constitution and the laws.

All offices were at the disposal of the crown, and nothing was hereditary, but the estates of the nobility ; yet the balance of power was on the side of the people. The king could not remove an office he had once conferred, but the people could depose the king, if he violated one law of the republic.

Two great parties were ever the standing monuments of faction in this government—the one in office, and the other in caballing to obtain promotion. The same bitterness and jealousy that prevailed against each other, involved the king ; both jealous of their power, held themselves as the guardians of their liberties.

The diets, or states general, regulated all the affairs of the republic. These were composed of the clergy, nobility, and gentry, which formed an elective body, over which the archbishop of Gnesna, as primate of the republic, presided ; and in case of an interregnum, he became viceroy.

This council met alternately in Poland and Lithuania, and sat armed in council, after the manner of their forefathers—and every gentleman of this body had a negative upon the senate, and by his single protest or vote, could stop the unanimous resolves of all the others ; and if he then quitted the city or town where the diet sat, he dissolved the assembly.

These seeds of rebellion often broke out into open violence; the diets broke up, and the parties held separate diets, under the sanctity of the king's name, and often without, or against his knowledge and consent, as the parliament of England did, in the reign of Charles I.: custom, not law, sanctioned these cabals.

In this feudal government, the nobility constituted the military strength of the nation; the peasantry were not trusted with arms: and to secure their own power against the crown, they did not build forts or castles of strength themselves, nor suffer the king. These armies, like the old feudal service in the south of Europe, were assembled on sudden emergencies, kept the field but a short time, for the want of discipline and regular supplies, and were often disbanded in disgust.

In addition to this force, a regular guard was provided for the kingdom, consisting of two parts, under two generals, independent of each other. The first, in Poland, consisted of 30,000 men, and the other in Lithuania of 12,000 men.—These generals were appointed by the king, but were amenable only to the republic. It was the duty of the state to support this force: but upon their neglect, each officer was bound to support his separate corps under his command; which he did by depredations upon the peasantry.

Such was the civil and military strength of Poland, when Charles XII. appeared upon its borders. In addition to this imbecile state of Poland, a civil war raged in Lithuania, between two rival families of the nobles. Charles, by throwing his weight into the scale of the one, destroyed the resistance of the other, and secured Lithuania.

His next object was to dethrone Augustus in the same way. The king had rendered himself unpopular, by introducing Saxon troops into Poland, when he laid siege to Riga; this jealousy weakened his dependence upon the army, then only about 18,000 strong, and rendered the situation of the king very critical and alarming; his only alternative was, to assemble a diet. This council, when assembled, were not so much prepared to grant him relief, as to scrutinize his measures; and it soon appeared that Charles XII. had the strongest party in the diet.

At the head of the party of Charles, stood the archbishop of Gnesna, primate of the kingdom, and president of the council. This grand dignitary, being well versed in the intrigues of Poland, and fired with resentment for some former disappointments, began to open the way for a great revolution.

He issued circular letters, disclosing the weakness and cabals of the diet, and exhorting to national union; at the same time he despatched an address to the king of Sweden, conjuring him to give Peace to Poland and her king. A negotiation soon ensued between the minister of Charles, and the prelate; and the intrigues at the prelate's house, regulated the movements of the diet. Charles seconded these measures whilst he lay with his army in Lithuania, by publicly declaring that he did not make war against the Poles, but only against Augustus and his Saxons; that the great object of his visit was, to restore the liberty of Poland.

At this time, Peter sent 20,000 Russians into Lithuania, to support the cause of Augustus, agreeable to treaty. These, by their ravages, distressed the Lithuanians, rendered the cause of Augustus still more unpopular, and served for employment to the Swedes, who were directed to harrass and drive them back into Russia.

CHAP. II.

Augustus attempts a secret peace with Charles XII—battle of Cracow—battle of the Bog—war in Polish Prussia—intrigues of the Primate—Augustus deposed—Stanislaus Leczinski elected king—capture of Leopold—coronation of Stanislaus.

IN this critical and alarming state of Poland, the diet broke up, Feb. 1702; but the senate continued at Warsaw, making provisional laws and regulations for the safety of the kingdom; a practice, sanctioned by custom, not by law. They decreed an embassy to the king of Sweden, the assembling the nobles in defence of the state; and attempted at the same time to diminish the power of the king. This attack upon the crown, decided the fate of Poland.

Augustus resolved to make a secret peace with Charles XII. To effect this, he engaged in his interest the countess of Conigsmark, (a Swedish lady, to whom he was attached,) and obtained her consent to negotiate for him with the king of Sweden, under cover of her paying her respects to that sovereign, in whose dominions she had resided, upon one of her estates.

The Countess was the handsomest, and most accomplished woman of the age, and mother of the great mareschal Saxe, who became so illustrious in the reign of Lewis XV. king of France. She repaired to the camp of the king of Sweden, and gained access to his minister, but not to the king; he cautiously avoided her.

Resolved to accomplish her purpose, the countess met the king in a narrow pass, stepped from her coach, and threw herself in his way. He coolly turned about his horse, and returned to his tent, choosing to evince to the world, that he preferred being vanquished, rather than subdued by a woman. The countess returned to Augustus.

At this time, the resolve of the senate had reached Augustus; he took advantage of it, and despatched his own minister to negotiate the treaty. Him Charles imprisoned, and then marched to Grodno. The deputation from the senate next waited upon Charles; these he received with great coolness and dignity. The conference was guarded, and nothing concluded. Charles then seized the critical moment, assured them that he would settle their affairs at Warsaw, took up his march, and entered that city the fifth of May, 1702.

This movement overawed the nation, and left the king as a fugitive, without strength, without troops, and without resources: these he attempted to supply from Saxony; but these troops only increased the general jealousy and alarm.

At this critical moment, the cardinal primate repaired to the king of Sweden, with whom he held a long conference standing, which Charles closed by announcing, "I will never give the Poles peace, until they have elected a new king:" this, the cardinal caused to be published throughout Poland.

The crisis had now arrived; Augustus had assembled his Saxons, and gone in quest of Charles, then advancing to Cracow, with an army of 12,000 men. Augustus met him upon a spacious plain with 24,000 men; the action commenced by a discharge of artillery, and the young duke of Holstein fell at the head of the Swedish cavalry.

Struck with the loss of this brave officer, and fired with ardor and rage, Charles, at the head of his guards, rushed into the heat of the action; the contest was bravely supported; the prize was the crown of Poland. The Saxons were broken—retired, and rallied to the charge, again and again, until overpowered by the resistless impetuosity of the Swedes, they fled in disorder, leaving their camp, artillery and baggage in the hands of the victors. Charles passed these without notice, pursued the vanquished to Cracow, and would have entered the city commixed with the fugitives, if the gates had not been closed upon him: these were instantly forced, and Charles entered in triumph; not a gun was fired; the soldiers fled to the castle; Charles entered the castle, commixed with the fugitives, and the city was reduced without a gun.

Charles immediately left the city, to pursue Augustus in his flight, determined to strike the finishing blow. In the midst of his zeal, his career was arrested by a fall from his horse, which broke his thigh. This confined him at Cracow six weeks, and gave Augustus time to recover in some measure his defeat. He caused it to be published extensively, that Charles XII. was dead, by the fall. This was generally believed, and involved the Poles in a new dilemma. Augustus seized the favorable moment, and assembled a diet, first at Marienburg, and next at Lublin: the representation was full, and the cardinal primate was present.

The misfortunes of the king, had learnt him to become more affable and conciliatory, and his sufferings had softened the passions of the diet; a general harmony prevailed, and Augustus received a new oath of allegiance from the diet, the purport of which was, "that they never had, and never would attempt any thing prejudicial to the cause of Augustus;" and the diet resolved to maintain an army of 50,000 men, for the protection of the crown.

Charles was now well; he summoned a new diet at Warsaw, and by the intrigues of the primate, set this diet to counteract the late diet of Augustus, by their disputes and decrees; and having received 6000 foot and 8000 horse from Sweden, he went in quest of general Stenau, at the head of the Saxons. In May, 1703—he came up with him behind the river Bog, near the confines of Prussia. Charles plunged his horse into the river, at the head of his cavalry; the resistance was slight, the Saxons fled, the king pursued, and their army was dispersed.

Augustus fled to Thorn, in Polish Prussia; Charles pursued, and laid siege to Thorn. To reduce this strong city, it became necessary to receive cannon, men, and supplies from Sweden; these in their way, met with some delay in passing.

by Dantzic, another free city of Polish Prussia, at the mouth of the Vistula ; this slight offence cost them 100,000 crowns.

Upon the reduction of Thorn, at the expiration of one month, Charles rewarded the governor for his bravery, but exacted a contribution of forty thousand crowns. Upon a slight offence from the city of Elbing, Charles exacted at the point of the bayonet a contribution of 260,000 crowns. All this secured the overthrow of Augustus.

During these operations of Charles, the cardinal primate repaired to Warsaw, attended by a retinue of soldiers from his own estates ; he threw off the mask, and published in the name of the assembly, " that Augustus, elector of Saxony, was incapable of wearing the crown of Poland ;" and all the assembly pronounced the throne vacant.

The cardinal now flattered himself that he had accomplished his purpose, and restored the crown to the family of John Sobieski, in the person of his son James ; who was waiting with impatience at Breslaw for the issue.

Augustus, alive to the views of the primate, sent a party of horse, surprised James Sobieski on a hunting party with his brother, conveyed them into Saxony, and imprisoned them at Leipsic. The same disaster awaited Augustus. Gen. Renschild surprised him at table with his friends, near Cracow—Augustus fled—Renschild pursued—the flight continued four days, almost in close view ; but Augustus escaped—and the king of Sweden was victorious in Poland.

Charles next offered the crown of Poland to Alexander, a third son of John Sobieski. Alexander refused, alleging, " that nothing should induce him to take advantage of his brother's misfortunes." Charles, agreeable to the views of his minister, offered the crown to his favorite, Stanislaus Leczinski. He in his turn refused it.

Charles sent a message to the assembly at Warsaw, " that they must elect a king of Poland in five days, and that Stanislaus must be the man." The cardinal primate used all his influence to defeat the election, but without effect ; he withdrew from the council, and Stanislaus was elected, and proclaimed king, amidst the acclamations of the diet, July 12, 1705. Charles repaired in secret to Warsaw, and witnessed the scene.

Charles compelled the cardinal, with all the absentees and opposers, to appear and do homage to the new king, and attend him to the quarters of the king of Sweden : who paid to Stanislaus all the honours due to the king of Poland, and supplied him with troops and money, to secure his power; took up his march to finish the conquest of Poland, and laid siege to Leopold.

This strong town was carried by assault, after a siege of one day, and yielded an immense treasure to Charles. Stanislaus remained at Warsaw with the cardinal primate, the bishop of Posnania, and some grandes of Poland, who composed his court, to arrange the affairs of his kingdom, with a guard of about 6000 men.

Augustus, apprized of the situation of Charles, and the fall of Leopold, collected a force of about 20,000 men, mostly Saxons, and by a rapid movement, fell upon Warsaw by surprise. The city was unfortified, and defenceless, against such a force. Stanislaus fled, his family and his friends scattered, and thus made their escape; his youngest daughter was concealed, and afterwards found in a manger, a humble station for her who was destined to become queen of France.

Augustus withdrew from Warsaw with his forces, committed the command to count Sculenburg, left the country to the ravages of the two kings, retired into Saxony, and fortified his capital. Sculenburg had the adroitness to elude the pursuit of the king of Sweden, and get off his army in good order, thus leaving Stanislaus in quiet possession of his crown.

The pope threatened all the ecclesiastics of Poland, with the thunders of his power, if they attempted to assist at the coronation of Stanislaus, or to take any measures contrary to the interests of Augustus.

Charles set his thunders at defiance, and witnessed (incog.) the magnificent coronation of Stanislaus and his queen, at Warsaw, October, 4, 1705, by the hands of the archbishop of Leopold, together with several other prelates; the crown, placed upon Stanislaus, was placed upon the object of the labours of Charles.

CHAP. III.

Reduction of Narva, by Peter I.—Peter commences the city of Petersburg—Charles XII. enters Saxony—peace with Augustus—Distresses of Poland—Charles XII. commences his march into Russia—Battle of the Berezina.

During these operations in Poland, the Czar of Russia was not idle; he had learnt in his travels in Holland, how the Dutch recovered their country from the sea, by their unremitted efforts, and caused the finest and most commercial cities in Europe, to rise up in the midst of the waters, and stand firm upon the softest mud.

Peter was now engaged in rescuing from the Baltic, a scite for his new city of Petersburg. To accomplish this, it became necessary for him to obtain possession of Narva, lying in the neighbourhood of his object. He laid siege again to Narva, and carried it by assault, August, 1703, after a regular siege; here he was constrained to draw his sword against his own soldiers, to check their cruel licentiousness towards the inhabitants, after their surrender.

Upon the fall of Narva, he drew the plan, and laid the foundation of the city of Petersburg, which, for its commerce, wealth, regularity and beauty, has become the admiration of Europe. To effect this, he had the same obstacles to overcome, that were peculiar to Amsterdam, in Holland, a foundation of mud, unconquerable to any other man than Peter, together with a climate so inhospitable as to destroy two hundred thousand men in the early stages of the enterprize.

Firm to his purpose, Peter surmounted all this in the midst of an unsuccessful war, and even when his allies were falling beneath the sword of his haughty overbearing rival. This very war he turned to his advantage, to prosecute his plan, and bring forward his city, whilst Charles was employed in giving away crowns in Poland.

In 1704, Petersburg had become the residence of more than three hundred thousand souls, which Peter had transplanted there from different parts of his dominions, and in 1705, when Stanislaus was crowned king of Poland, Petersburg had become a commercial city, and its harbour was full of foreign ships. The liberality of Peter drew strangers of all descriptions, from all parts of Europe, and Petersburg was soon filled with commerce and the arts.

In the midst of these labors, he rendered some assistance to Augustus; but his means could not accomplish both ends—his new city grew, but Augustus fell. This fall roused up the Czar to new efforts; he saw his own dominions laid open to the conqueror, upon this event; and he put forth his efforts to recover, what he had not been careful to prevent. He invited Augustus, (by his minister Patkul,) to a conference at Grodno; and repaired thither with an army of 70,000 men.

Augustus met him, attended by general Scullemburg, and the scattered remains of his troops. The conference was short: the Czar was called suddenly to quell an insurrection in Astracan, and left his army to co-operate with Augustus, in recovering the crown of Poland.

Augustus soon after ordered his minister, John Patkul, to be arrested and imprisoned at Dresden, upon a suspicion of an intrigue, to settle a separate peace between the Czar, and the king of Sweden.

The plan of Augustus in distributing his Russian and Saxon troops into small divisions, to harass and distress the Poles, as well as the king of Sweden, led to the most active operations. Charles co-operated with Stanislaus, and they fell upon these several divisions in such rapid succession, that Poland was soon cleared, the Russians were driven behind the Boristhenes, and all the treasures of Augustus and his Russian allies, fell into the hands of Charles; together with an entire regiment of French soldiers, which had been taken by the Saxons at the famous battle of Hochstet, in their war with Lewis XIV. 1704, and entered into the Saxon service.

Charles received this regiment at their request, into his service, on the same day of their capture. Having settled the conquest of Poland, and secured the crown to Stanislaus, he prepared to enter Germany. Charles by rapid movements, marched into Saxony, where he was triumphant, and gave law to the electorate.

On his passing through Silesia, he gave a general alarm to the empire, already torn and harassed by the distressing wars with Lewis XIV. who was supporting the claims of the house of Bourbon upon the throne of Spain.

They were soon relieved; his stay was short in Saxony; he visited the field of Lutzen, rendered so famous by the death of the great Gustavus Adolphus; paid a tribute of respect to his memory, and exclaimed; "I have endeavoured to live like him, God perhaps may grant me as glorious a death."

Charles proceeded to levy enormous contributions upon Saxony, to the amount of 625,000 rix dollars per month, with daily rations for his army whilst he staid; established a new and energetic police: and attended the great fair of Leipsic; the whole electorate enjoyed the most profound tranquility, during the stay of the king of Sweden.

During these movements in Saxony, Augustus, deprived of both of his crowns, was a wanderer in Poland. In the depth of despair he wrote to the king of Sweden, secretly, by the baron de Imhoff, and sued for peace. Charles received the letter, and replied, "I consent to give peace to Augustus upon the following conditions, which can never be altered :

1. "That Augustus renounce the crown of Poland forever : that he acknowledge Stanislaus as lawful king : and that he promise never to mount the throne of Poland, not even after the death of Stanislaus."

2. "That he renounce all other treaties, and particularly those he has made with Muscovy."

During this negotiation, a Russian army, under prince Menzikoff, appeared in Poland, joined Augustus, and threw him into the greatest embarrassments. An action commenced at the same time, with a detachment of Swedes, in which, for the first time, the Russians were victorious ; and Augustus entered Warsaw in triumph. In the midst of Te Deum, which Augustus had ordered for the successful action, a messenger arrived with the treaty of peace from Charles.

Augustus signed it, resigned his crown, and set off for Saxony to meet Charles. The two sovereigns met : Charles received, and treated Augustus respectfully, and gave him the right hand ; but compelled him to write a letter of congratulation to Stanislaus ; renounce the title of king of Poland, and erase it from the public prayers.

Fired with resentment at this inglorious peace, the Czar reentered Poland at the head of 60,000 men, flew to Leopold, assembled a diet, and ordered a new king of Poland to be elected. The factions of Leopold controlled the diet ; Peter transferred the diet to Lublin : factions still prevailed—they made no choice, renounced both kings, and dissolved the diet.

This threw the republic into an unparalleled state of wretchedness : the sword of civil war was drawn ; the torch of civil war was lit ; conflict, carnage, pillage, and conflagration marked the movements of all the parties, and the Poles abhorred alike their kings, the Czar, and Charles XII.

In the midst of this state of wretchedness and distress, Stanislaus appeared in Poland with a body of troops from Saxony ; the discipline of his troops, and his money, rallied the Poles around his standard, and he was soon at the head of such a force, as compelled the Czar to abandon Poland.

At this critical moment appeared a third party in Poland, headed by count Sinkausky, grand general of the crown. He made great efforts to be elected king and failed, and was now become the head of a party of some considerable force, whose only subsistence was pillage. This third scourge of Poland, was of short continuance; they soon abandoned their chiefs, repaired to the standard of Stanislaus, and he became the acknowledged sovereign of Poland.

During these movements in Poland, Charles held his court at Altranstadt, where he received ambassadors from all the powers of the south of Europe, then engaged in the great contest about the Spanish succession. Although Charles had pledged himself in 1700, that he would not interfere in the quarrel—yet the great duke of Marlborough could not be persuaded, that money would not make a man change his opinion, and even his word, until, as ambassador of queen Ann, he had visited Charles XII. king of Sweden.

Charles had now passed one whole year in Saxony, where by his diplomatic skill, he had humbled the emperor of Germany, protected the Lutherans in Silesia, dethroned one king, crowned another, and rendered himself the admiration of Europe, and the terror of the north. He prepared to depart.

On the approach of his departure, he ordered the grand Marschal of his household, to lay before him the rout from Leipsic, to all the capitals in Europe: and, September, 1707, he commenced his march for Poland, at the head of 43,000 men, to join count Levenhaupt, with 20,000 more, together with such recruits as were often arriving from Sweden. At the head of this army, he received an ambassador from the sultan of Constantinople, with a present of one hundred Swedes, purchased of the Tartars, and the compliments of the ambassador, upon the accession of Stanislaus.

Charles, at the head of this strong force, cleared Poland of all the Russians, settled the tranquillity of the kingdom, left Stanislaus 10,000 Swedes, for the protection of his crown, and commenced his march, amidst frost and snow, in the month of January, 1708, to surprize the Czar in Grodno.

Peter had the good luck to escape at the north gate, when Charles entered at the south; and made his retreat. The next day, Peter, finding that Charles had advanced by a rapid movement, with only 600 of his guards, surprized the king of Sweden in his turn, at Grodno, with a force of 1500 men: an action ensued and the impetuosity of Charles, compelled Peter to flee with precipitation, and secure his retreat.

Peter collected his forces in Lithuania, and retired into Muscovy, by forced marches, and laid waste the country. Charles pursued with rapid movements—harrassing and distressing the Russians in their flight: the wilds of Muscovy, covered only with morasses and deep forests, almost impenetrable, with a scanty supply of subsistence—rendered this flight extremely distressing; and to crown all, it was in the heart of a Russian winter. The Czar continued to retire, through the winter and spring. Charles advanced; and on the 25th of June, they met on the opposite banks of the Berezina. Here the Czar had collected his forces, intrenched his camp, and awaited the approach of the king of Sweden.

Charles, by gaining a pass, crossed the river, and attacked and routed the Czar—who retired on to the Boristhenes, destroying the roads and bridges, and laying waste the country.

Charles fell in with an army of 30,000 Russians, strongly intrenched behind a morass: impatient for the attack, he detached a party of horse, to take the enemy in flank—plunged into the morass, at the head of his guards, and commenced the assault: the resistance was firm, but the Russians were broken and dispersed, and the action was decisive. This memorable action, caused this memorable medal. Upon one side was inscribed—Sylvas, paludas, aggeras, hostes, victi. Woods, -marshes, mounds, and enemies conquered. Upon the other—Victrices copias alium laturus in orbem. Wafting his warlike troops to the other world.

Upon the loss of this action, the Czar sued for peace: to which Charles replied, "I will treat at Moscow." Charles advanced to Smolensk: here he attacked a body of 10,000 horse, and 6,000 Cossacks, with his accustomed impetuosity. The troops were routed, and fled: Charles pursued; the Cossacks ambushed him at the head of his guard, and cut off his communication with his main body: a desperate conflict ensued—the king was dismounted, his horse killed, and he engaged hand to hand, with these savages of the north, and by his desperate valour, he killed and kept at bay these desperate assailants, with the loss of all his attendants except five.

In this critical and alarming situation, a colonel Dardof, at the head of a little band, broke through the Tartars, relieved the king, and put the enemy to flight. Charles with his usual intrepidity, mounted his horse, put himself at the head of his troops, and pursued the fugitives, more than two leagues on his route to Moscow.

Charles, who had advanced more than five hundred leagues, into the heart of an enemy's country, amidst the most unparalleled successes—began now to feel the want of recruits, to supply the place of those who had purchased his victories by their death; and others who were sick, or dead, with the fatigues and diseases of the march; together with supplies and military stores for his army, through the severities of a Russian winter. Knowing that Peter had laid waste the country, and destroyed the bridges and the roads leading to Moscow—he began to pause and consider: his only dependence now was, on the arrival of general Levenhaupt, with stores and recruits from Sweden, to reinforce and refresh, as well as support his army.

In this situation Charles commenced a negotiation with Mazeppa, prince of the Ukraine Cossacks, who engaged to supply him with 30,000 men, ammunition, provisions, money, &c. and to meet him, with these supplies, at a given time and place.

Pleased with this new fund of resources, and having the more confidence in Mazeppa, as a Polander by birth and education, and then at enmity with the Czar—Charles turned aside from the road to Moscow, and attempted to penetrate, by devious ways, into the almost impenetrable forests of the Ukrain, in quest of the prince of the Tartars.

In this attempt he lost almost all his artillery and baggage, in passing the rivers, and deep morasses of the forests; exhausted with fatigue, and in want of almost all things, he arrived at the place of general rendezvous, at the time appointed. Mazeppa appeared; but to the astonishment of the king, it was only to announce, that Peter, apprised of his treachery, had intercepted all his plans, destroyed his army, and carried off his treasures; and, instead of an ally, Charles found a fugitive, who relied upon his protection, and who was pursued by the same troops that had ruined him.

At this eventful moment, Levenhaupt arrived; not with the 15,000 Swedes he had led out of Sweden—not with the convoy of provisions and military stores, to replenish the army of the king—but with the news, that the Czar had attacked him, on the 7th of October, 1708, near the town of Lerno, upon the Boristhenes, with a greatly superior force; that he had had the honor to rout the Czar, in five successive engagements, and had cut his way through the Russians, with the loss of ten or twelve thousand men, together with all his convoy of provisions and military stores, and after suffering incredible hardships, to penetrate to the camp of the king, with this handful of men

The memorable winter of 1709, had now set in. In the midst of these disasters, Charles made a movement to seize on the town of Pultowa, (a strong magazine of the Czar's upon the eastern extremity of the Ukrain,) defended by a regular force of 10,000 men, and covered by the Czar, with an army of 70,000. The Swedish king had now about 30,000 men: 2000 of these, he had the distressing mortification to witness the loss of, by the severity of cold and hunger, on his march to Pultowa.

On the 10th of May, he sat down before the town, and commenced the siege. During the operations of the siege, Charles received a wound in his heel, which deprived him of the use of his leg, but not of his spirits. On the 11th of July, the Czar advanced to the relief of Pultowa: Charles marched out of his trenches to meet him, carried on a litter.

This was not the action of Narva; the Russians were now trained to arms and discipline. The Swedes charged the Russians with their usual impetuosity; the Russians were routed; they recovered, and rallied to the charge, penetrated the camp of the king, three times shot away his litter, and after a desperate conflict of two hours, routed and destroyed his army. Charles fled on horseback; attended with a few of his principal officers, and a few stragglers, (in all about three hundred,) and took refuge with the Turks.

Thus closed the most brilliant, mad career of glory, the world had ever witnessed, since the days of Alexander; and the fatal battle of Pultowa, sealed the fate of Charles XII. with a long adieu to all his visionary schemes, to all his greatness; placed his rival triumphant upon the throne of the Czars, as the arbiter of the north, and secured to him the prosecution of all his vast plans and enjoyments.

Peter pushed the enlargement and improvements of his favourite city, extended the contemplated canals, amended his code of laws, to govern, tame and civilize his subjects; extended his commerce, manufactures and agriculture, by every possible encouragement; and thus triumphed over Charles, by the greatness of his life, as well as by the feats of his arms.

The war which the Spanish succession had kindled in the south, still raged with violence; but the fall of Charles XII. damped the ardor of Lewis XIV. and led him to despair of that aid, which he had vainly hoped for from the king of Sweden, and make humiliating concessions, with overtures for peace; concessions such as nothing but the overbearing demands of the allies could have rejected. The spirit of the parties was not yet tamed, and the war continued to rage.

Peter restored the sovereignty of Poland, to Augustus; deposed Stanislaus, expelled the Swedes, took possession of the provinces upon the Baltic, and gave peace to the west.

Charles, agreeable to a generous maxim of the Turks, was honourably received, and conducted to Bender, (a frontier town on the north of Turkey in Europe,) and saluted upon his arrival, with a discharge of artillery—where agreeable to his wishes, he and his retinue were lodged in a little camp, on the banks of the Niester.

Charles and his camp became the objects of the day; were visited by all the neighbouring country, and became the resort of strangers. His temperance and devotion endeared him to the Turks, and they were ready to acknowledge him as a true musselman.

Charles repaired to Bender, with a design to kindle a war between the Turks, and Russians; and he commenced his intrigues with the sublime Porte, immediately for that purpose, through the influence of his envoy, and his friend, Poniatowski, a Polish nobleman; who commixed with the Turks, in free and familiar intercourse, and often presented the king of Sweden's memorials to the Sultan, Achmet III. on his way to mosque. By this means, he obtained the favors of the Sultan, for the king of Sweden, and at the same time caused the grand vizier to be deposed.

One instance of these intrigues, was conducted in the following manner:—"The grand Seignior goes every Friday to mosque, (a Mahometan temple,) surrounded by his Solacs, or guards, whose turbans are adorned with such high feathers, as to conceal the Sultan from the view of the people. When any one has a petition to present, he endeavours to mingle with the guards, and holds up the paper aloft. Sometimes the Sultan condescends to receive it himself; but he more commonly sends an Aga to take charge of it, and causes it to be laid before him on his return from mosque. Poniatowski had no other method of conveying the king of Sweden's complaint to Achmet."

The effects of this petition were, a present from the Sultan to the king, of twenty-five fine Arabian horses; one of which having carried his sublime Highness, was covered with a saddle ornamented with precious stones, and furnished with stirrups of pure gold—accompanied with a polite letter, with marks of approbation towards the vizier; but he was soon banished to Crim Tartary.

The new vizier was as averse to war with the Czar, as the former, and endeavoured to persuade Charles to return home; gave him eight hundred purses, of five hundred crowns each, to defray the expenses of his journey; but all to no effect: Charles was not ready. The Czar was on the throne of Russia, and Charles was determined the Turk should take him off. To accomplish this, he ceased not to insinuate, that the successes of Peter would enable him to gratify his ambition, and make himself master of the Black Sea, subdue the Cossacs—carry his arms into Crim Tartary, and even threaten Constantinople.

CHAP. IV.

Peter I. enters Moscow in triumph—War between Turkey and Russia—perilous escape of Peter I.—Peace—intrigues of Charles XII.—Battle of Bender—War rages in the Swedish provinces of Germany.

DURING these intrigues of the fugitive king, Peter the great appeared at the head of his empire in all the majesty of a great monarch. To impress his own subjects, and the world with the splendor of his arms, and the magnitude of his victories—(after he had placed Augustus upon the throne of Poland, and given peace to the north,) he made a triumphant entry into Moscow, in a most splendid and magnificent style, after the manner of a Roman triumph—under seven triumphal arches, decorated in the most superb style; the whole illustrative of the conquests at Pultowa, by a display of the trophies of that victory.

A regiment of guards led the procession, followed by the artillery taken from the Swedes, each piece drawn by eight horses, covered with scarlet housings, hanging down to the ground; next the Swedish kettle drums, colours, and standards, carried by the officers and soldiers who had captured them, succeeded by the finest troops of the Czar—and in succession to these was drawn the litter of Charles XII. on which he was carried at the battle of Pultowa, all shattered by the cannon shot, and displayed conspicuously upon a chariot—then in a train followed all the Swedish generals, officers and soldiers taken at Pultowa, two and two, together with the king of Sweden's prime minister.

Next followed the Czar, mounted on the same horse he rode at the battle of Pultowa, and followed by the generals who commanded on that glorious day. A vast train of waggons loaded with Swedish military stores, preceded by a regiment of Russian guards, closed the grand procession.

This splendid and magnificent display, opened a new field for the admiration of these untutored sons of the north, inspired them with veneration for the Czar, for their country, laws, religion and arms, and excited a new spirit of emulation in Russia. Charles availed himself of this triumph, to gratify his own malignant mortification, by representing through fresh intrigues, the dangerous ambition of Peter; caused a second grand Vizier to be deposed, and obtained a successor to his wishes; him he inspired with the spirit of war. Achmet himself, had now caught the flame, and the Janizaries were ripe for a war with Russia.

The vizier assembled an army of two hundred thousand men, imprisoned the Russian ambassador in the seven towers, (which is the Turkish method of declaring war,) and prepared to enter the dominions of the Czar. Peter, upon the first intelligence, withdrew his troops from Poland, and the provinces of the west, and prepared for the conflict.—The vizier assembled his army, according to custom, in the neighbourhood of Adrianople, and in three days after the first review, took the field, and commenced operations.

Peter had already taken the field; on his way to the theatre of action, he entered Moldavia, received the submission of this Turkish province, and the governor, prince Cantemir, became his ally in the war. This inflamed the confidence of Peter; he advanced into the heart of the province, upon the river Pruth, near to the capital. The vizier advanced to meet him, with an army of 250,000; crossed the Pruth, and invested Peter in his camp.

Thus caught in the toils, Peter saw himself involved in the same error of the king of Sweden at Pultowa, and that the fate of his army must depend upon the fate of an action, upon the most unfavourable terms.

At this critical moment, count Poniatowski (who accompanied the vizier) sent an express to the king of Sweden at Bender: Charles rode post night and day, to witness the fall of his rival. Peter attempted to withdraw in the night, but the Turk discovered the movement, fell upon his rear, and threw his army into confusion: they rallied, and made a firm stand against two successive attacks. The vizier then changed his operations, and invested the Czar in his camp; this reduced him to the alternative of starving or fighting, under such disparity of numbers, with a victorious enemy.

Peter retired to his tent in despair, resolved to try the dreadful experiment of forcing his way at the point of the bayonet, with 30,000 men, through an army of 250,000, flushed with their recent successes—and forbade any one to approach him.

In this critical moment of distress, Catharine, whom from a country girl, he had made empress, ventured to repair to his tent; she flung herself at his feet, and entreated him to permit her in his name, to offer proposals of peace to the grand vizier; Peter consented: she presented him a letter, he signed it; she selected an officer on whom she could depend, and despatched the letter, with a present, according to custom, and received for answer from the vizier: "Let the Czar send me his prime minister, and I shall then consider what is to be done."

The chancellor of Peter repaired to the camp of the vizier; a negociation took place, accompanied with a cessation of arms, for six hours, and a treaty was concluded, in which Peter stipulated—"to restore Azoph to the Porte, destroy the harbor of Sangerou, and demolish his forts on the Palus Mœotis, withdraw his troops from Poland, give no further disturbance to the Cossacs, and permit the king of Sweden to return to his own dominions."

At the eventful moment, when the treaty was signed, and Peter was enjoying the fulness of plenty in his camp, protected by a peace, arrived Charles XII. Stung with chagrin, mortification and disappointment, at the folly of the vizier, the escape of his enemy, the ruin of all his efforts, and the disappointment of his high expectations, he flew to the tent of the vizier, reproached him keenly for the treaty he had made; threw himself on to his sofa, and with an eye of indignant scorn, thrust out his leg, entangled his spur in his robe, purposely tore it; rose with the most sullen silence, and returned to Bender. The treaty was received at Constantinople with applause, and public rejoicings, yet Charles found means to be revenged on the vizier, and he was disgraced.

This affair did not rest here. Charles was not so fortunate in the next vizier; his supplies, of 500 crowns per day, were withdrawn, together with the rich supplies of his table. The sultan became deaf to all further thoughts of war with Russia, and determined to send out of his dominions, this intriguing, fugitive king.

The sultan wrote Charles to this effect with his own hand: and after styling him "Most powerful among the kings who worship Jesus, brilliant in majesty, a lover of glory and honor," he positively assured him, that he had laid aside all further views of war with the Czar, and pressed him to return to his own dominions.

Charles was not yet ready to go: he did not comply—but continued his intrigues. The sultan sent to Charles to prepare immediately for his departure; with 1200 purses, under the care of the bashaw of Bender, to provide for his journey. Charles deceived the Bashaw, got the money, but still refused to go: this occasioned the bashaw much trouble and address to save his head.

The sultan assembled his divan, in which it was advised to send away the king of Sweden by force. The bashaw of Bender communicated this order to the king of Sweden: Charles replied, "Obey your master, if you dare, and leave my presence immediately." The Bashaw obeyed, and prepared to execute the sultan's orders: Charles prepared to resist, and the bashaw besieged him in his little camp, drew up his army of Turks and Cossacks, opened his fire from his artillery, and advanced to the charge; the camp was carried, and 300 Swedes made prisoners.

Charles being on horseback, dismounted, and took to his house: here, amidst his general officers and domestics, he made a stand with musketry, against the assault of the whole Turkish force. By a spirited fire from the windows, they killed about 200 Turks. The Turks fired the house; and when the roof fell in, Charles, by the advice of one of his attendants, rushed out of the flames, at the head of his little band, and with the sword attempted to cut his way through the Turks, to the Chancery house, and there make a stand. Pressed by the Turks, he tripped with his spurs, and fell; the Janizaries seized him and bore him away. The bashaw received him in his own house, guarded him close ; but treated him like a king. The next day he sent him to Demirtash, near to Adrianople : here he learnt that king Stanislaus was a prisoner amongst the Turks : here he renewed his intrigues, and complained to the sultan of the unprecedented severity of his treatment. The sultan covered his own character, by a general sacrifice of his ministers ; but Charles remained a prisoner, and to avoid being sent away by force, took to his bed, and lay ten months, served alone by his principal officers.

During these scenes, the generals of Charles were performing feats of valor, in defending his provinces in Germany, from the ravages of the Danes and Saxons. The allies bombarded the city of Stade, in the duchy of Bremen, and reduced it to ashes. Steenbock, the Swedish general, defeated the allies in a desperate battle, and revenged the barbarity of Stade, by burning Altena, a city of the king of Denmark. Fired with the spirit of his master, Steenbock did valiantly ; but a junction of the Russians, with the Danes and Saxons, drove him into Holstein, besieged him in Toningen, and made him a prisoner, with all his army.

The baron De Gortz then undertook to manage by intrigue the affairs of the king of Sweden, and effect by negotiation, what Steenbock had failed to accomplish by arms.

CHAP. V.

Charles XII. returns to Sweden ; defence of Stralsund ; naval operations upon the Baltic ; Peter I. enters Petersburg in triumph ; fall of Stralsund.

DESPAIRING of success from his intrigues, tired of this inactive life, and alarmed for the fate of Sweden, Charles roused from his confinement and prepared to depart. The Vizier furnished him with an escort and supplies according to his wishes, and he set out by the way of Germany with sixty loaded waggons, and an escort of three hundred horse to return to Sweden. On the confines of Transylvania he dismissed his escort, took leave of his friends, and attended by one officer, rode post night and day through Germany, and arrived at Stralsund November 21, 1714. Here he passed the winter, making general arrangements to prosecute the war with vigor in the spring.

The war which the Spanish succession had kindled in the south of Europe, and which had raged with so much violence in Flanders, Spain, Italy, Germany, and upon the ocean, was now hushed to peace by the treaties of Utrecht and Rastadt, March, 1713.

The flame of war, which was kindled under the northern league, against the young king of Sweden, had never been extinguished; the parties were now exerting all their efforts to accomplish their grand purpose, and divide up Sweden. Prussia, Denmark and Saxony were ready to invest Stralsund at the opening of the spring. Peter, with a fleet of thirty ships of war, the fruits of his own persevering genius, and in part the labors of his own hands, rode triumphant upon the Baltic.

He became, from actual experience, the best carpenter, admiral and pilot of the north; this he acquired by the successive grades of merit, from the lowest service up to the highest; he became admiral, as he became master-builder in his dock-yards, and general in his armies.

Peter, having completed the reduction of Finland, put to sea with a fleet of thirty sail of the line, eighty gallies, and forty half-gallies, with twenty-thousand land forces, all from his new port of Cronslot, near to Petersburg, to make a descent upon the Island of Aland, on the coast of Sweden, near to Stockholm.

He created Apraxin admiral of this fleet, and served as vice-admiral himself. On the 16th of July, 1714, he fell in with the Swedish fleet, commanded by vice-admiral Erinchild—an action commenced which lasted three hours. The Czar attacked the Swedish vice-admiral, and took him after a severe engagement; sixteen thousand troops were landed on the Island, at the same time; they took and carried on board the fleet all the troops found upon the Island, and Peter returned to Cronslot in triumph, with the vice-admiral's ship: three others, one frigate, and six gallies, the trophies of his victory. Having assembled his fleet, he set sail and entered the harbor of Petersburg, amidst the triple discharge of one hundred and fifty pieces of cannon.

Here commenced a new scene. This Petersburg, where in the year 1700, not one solitary house was to be seen, where not even a fishing boat was to be found, and when the great founder of it was a common carpenter in the dock-yards of Holland, now displayed the magnificence of thirty-four thousand five hundred houses, in the most superb style of modern architecture. That port which Peter had formed with indefatigable efforts and labor now witnessed the triumphant entry of a victorious fleet of thirty sail of the line, with the prizes of the Swedish fleet : and to crown the whole, the Czar repeated at Petersburg the splendor of the triumphs of Moscow ; he made his triumphant entry into Petersburg, and amidst the display of the trophies of his victory, the Swedish vice-admiral graced his train. The conquests of Peter, were devoted to the benefit of Petersburg : all that was valuable in manufactures, and the arts and sciences, were destined to enrich and improve his new capital. Triumphant over Sweden, by land and sea, he now became the arbiter of Poland, and held the balance between Augustus and his nobles. Charles XII. all this time, was intriguing in Turkey, fighting the bashaw of Bender, or lying a bed ; and having rode post fifteen days and nights, was now prepared to defend Stralsund against the allies. His country in his absence, had been ravaged and despoiled of nearly all his foreign possessions ; her veteran troops, once so formidable, had fallen, wasted and perished : more than one hundred thousand were prisoners in Russia, and as many more, the Tartars had sold to the Turks ; and the enterprise and ardor of Sweden, had wasted with her commerce, her money, her credit, and her troops.

The scales were turned. Peter now stood on that high ground, which Charles had abandoned ; and Charles, in his turn had to begin anew. Charles, having arranged the defence of his kingdom, prepared to defend Stralsund. His arrival had rekindled the ancient spirit of Sweden ; man vied with man, in the general preparations. The Prussian and Danish fleet, sunk and destroyed five Swedish ships before Stralsund.

Peter rode triumphant before Stockholm, with twenty ships of the line, one hundred and fifty transports, and 30,000 men threatening a descent ; he filled all Sweden with alarm. At the same time, he overran and subdued all Finland, east of the Gulf of Bothnia, and held possession. The king of Prussia seized on the island of Usedom, and the city of Stetin, at the mouth of the Oder, and dispossessed the Swedes.

During these operations, Charles conducted the defence of Stralsund, with a garrison of 9,000 men ; besieged by the kings of Denmark and Prussia, at the head of 36,000 men. Stralsund was a place of great strength and importance, inaccessible by land, and considered so by water ; defended by Charles XII. who was confident it could not be taken.

An accident discovered to the besiegers, that the fortress which protected the city, was accessible on the side of the sea, and that the Baltic receded under a strong west wind, and left but three feet of water. The besiegers availed themselves of this ; the same night a party of 1800 men plunged into the water ; at the same time, another party of 2,000, commenced an attack by land. The troops in the water penetrated to the walls, entered unobserved, and carried the fortress with a cruel slaughter : part of the garrison fled to the town ; the conquerors pursued, and entered, with the fugitives ; but their course was arrested at the drawbridge—they were all taken, and the town saved.

The besiegers attempted to make a lodgment upon the island of Rugen, opposite to the harbor of Stralsund. This place Charles knew the importance of securing : to this end, he repaired to Rugen, with a few of his principal officers, to encourage and support the little garrison of 2,000 men, who were stationed for its defence. The same night the besiegers sailed to the islands, with a fleet of transports, carrying 15,000 men, under the command of the prince of Anhalt.—The cautious prince, intrenched his camp, in the dead of night, with a deep ditch and chevaux-de-frise, with as much caution and strength, as if he knew the king of Sweden had been there with his army. Charles, apprised of the landing, but ignorant of the force of the enemy, drew out his little band, marched three leagues in dead of night, and at two in the morning, his soldiers began to pull up the cheveu-de-frise. This gave the alarm ; and the prince and his party stood to their arms. Charles advanced, and discovered the ditch ; struck with surprise, he leapt into it, and his soldiers followed his example : by the greatest personal exertions, they penetrated the camp—the action commenced—the impetuosity of the Swedes bore down all before them ; but the weight of numbers soon checked the onset. The enemy rallied, and charged in their turn ; the conflict was desperate—the Swedes retired—Charles fled, ignorant of his pursuer—the prince pursued, alike ignorant of those who fled before him : Charles rallied his troops to the charge—the carnage was terrible—the king witnessed the fall of his favorites, Grothusen, and general Dardoff, by his side. Deering, who rode post with him through Germany, fifteen days, lay dead at his feet. Charles was then announced by name, by a Danish lieutenant, who knew him, and had seized him by the hair, and with uplifted sword, was ready to sever his devoted head. Charles drew a pistol from his sash, and shot the lieutenant dead in the act. The name of the king, thickened the cloud about him, and he received a ball under the left breast. At this critical moment, Poniatowski, who had saved the king at Bender—appeared with his horse, penetrated to the king, and set him thereon; the Swedes retired to their fortress, and secured the king. The next day he abandoned his brave Swedes to their fate, returned to Stralsund, and his little band surrendered prisoners of war.

The brave count Villelongue, who jeoparded his life for the king, at Adrianople, was taken at the head of that French regiment, which joined the king of Sweden in Poland, when taken from Augustus; and now passed into the service of the prince of Anhalt. Shut up in Stralsund, Charles felt the severities of a bombardment—and half the town was in ruins: the citizens were all become soldiers, and rallied with cheerfulness around their king. Charles continued to repel the attacks and assaults of the enemy, until all hopes of resistance failed; he then yielded to the voice of his friends—to abandon a town whose defence had become desperate, and provide for his safety. This had now become as difficult and dangerous, as the defence of Stralsund.

It was now the 20th of December, 1715; the frost had set in, and the harbor was frozen; but Charles made the attempt, in a small fishing boat, accompanied by only ten persons. They succeeded in breaking the ice unmolested by the enemy's shipping; passed the fort with only the loss of two men, from an incessant fire; landed at Scania, and from thence Charles passed to Carlsroon, (the port from whence he embarked on his expedition against Copenhagen, in the year 1700, to give law to the north.) The next day Stralsund surrendered. Charles rode post to visit his sister, by appointment, on the banks of lake Weten, and on the next day returned to Carlescroon, and passed the winter.

CHAP. VI.

Invasion of Norway—Baron de Gortz—death of Charles XII.

peace—characters of Peter I. and Charles XII.—Immediate causes of the French Revolution.

CHARLES had inspired all Sweden with the same zeal which he had kindled in Stralsund, and the readiness with which they rallied round his standard, and opened their treasures to supply his armies, gave him such confidence, that instead of defending Sweden against a concerted attack from the Danes and Russians; in the month of March, he assembled an army; braved the severity of this early season, and the greater severity of roads almost impassable; passed into Norway, and laid siege to Christiana.

This bold stroke gave some eclat to his arms, and excited a general attention; but the approach of the Danish fleet, and the want of supplies obliged him to return into Sweden. At this time, the intrigues of his prime minister, the baron de Gortz, began to take some effect. De Gortz had sown the seeds of jealousy between Peter, and the states of Germany; and was now diffusing the same seeds between Peter, and the king of Denmark. He carried his intrigues into all the courts of Europe; favored the pretender in France, and flattered Charles XII. with the prospect of invading Scotland; and in short, the operations of war were changed into finesse and intrigue.

Peter at this time again visited Holland and France, to perfect that education which he had begun fifteen years before. Here he had an interview with the baron de Gortz, who obtained great influence, by attaching Peter to that mysterious system of politics, he was so insiduously sowing throughout Europe, and induced him to listen to terms of peace with Charles; flattered him that the arms of Russia and Sweden united, might make an easy conquest of Denmark, establish the independent sovereignty of the Baltic, and a free intercourse with the ocean; and hinted, that such a peace would guarantee to him the provinces conquered from Sweden, which had been so much the object of Peter. These hints, with such others as Peter foresaw were connected with them, added to the low state of his funds, led him to listen seriously to de Gortz.

Charles had now recovered some strength, he again entered Norway, December, 1718, and laid siege to Frederickshall. He opened the trenches in the midst of frost and snow, and assisted in person in the most arduous operations. Here, in directing the approaches by star-light, he was killed instantly, by a grape-shot, which passed through his head. Charles seized the hilt of his sword, and died without a groan.

This momentous event put a new face upon Europe, and was followed by a general cessation of arms. The prince of Hesse, brother-in-law to Charles, led back the Swedes from Norway into their own country, unmolested by the Danes. The senate of Sweden ordered the baron de Gortz to be arrested, tried, condemned, and executed as a mal-adviser to the king, and an enemy to Sweden. They next elected Ulrica Elenora (sister of Charles XII.) their queen, and rendered the crown of Sweden elective: she conferred it upon her husband, the prince of Hesse. Sweden soon settled a peace with all her enemies but Peter: he continued the war, and ravaged the coast of Sweden, until the peace of 1721, which guaranteed to the Czar the provinces of Livonia, Esthonia, Ingria, a part of Carelia, and of Finland. The Czar then took the title of emperor, which was acknowledged by all Europe. The characters of these two heroes of the north, are here drawn at large; never were two characters so uniformly great, and so uniformly different. The effects and consequences which resulted, are the best comment it is in the power of man to make, or language to express; in the effects are displayed the true contrast of their characters.

We have witnessed how ambition without judgment, has humbled the first nation of the north; and how ambition united with judgment, has tamed a wilderness of barbarians into a nation of soldiers; has created ports, cities, fleets and commerce, in the midst of almost impenetrable forests, and raised their august author to the high station of arbiter of the north.

Three objects in particular are designed in this minute narrative of the reigns of Charles and Peter: the first, to shew the history of the two nations, in connection with the other nations of Europe; second, the rise, progress and improvements of the Russian nation; and third, the effects of this, in controlling the French revolution.

The north, after the peace that followed the death of Charles XII. enjoyed an uninterrupted repose down to the French revolution, excepting such connection as they had with the great wars of the south, which we have noticed in the second part; together with a short, but successful war, between Russia and the Turks, from 1736 to 1738. We also noticed in detail, the efforts of Charles VIII, Lewis XII. Francis I.

Henry IV. and Lewis XIV. kings of France, to recover the iron crown of Charlemagne, and the empire of the west.— We noticed also the feuds which sprang up in France in the reign of Lewis XIV. between the Jansenists and Jesuits; between the king and the parliament; and the general excitement of the nation, occasioned by the pope's bull Unigenitus; the suppression of the Jesuits, and the suspension of the parliaments by Lewis XV.; and alluded briefly to the rise of infidel philosophy. We will now pursue the great object of this third part, and illustrate the origin, causes, effects, and operations of the French revolution.

The labors of Luther, and the light of the reformation, had disclosed the mysteries of iniquity, and shewn to a certain portion of Europe, the fallacy and corruption of auricular confession, the sale of indulgences, pardon and remission of sins, the absurdity of purgatory, and papal supremacy. The expansion given to the mind by the arts and sciences, led the philosophers of France, and of Europe, to discover the same mystery of iniquity through another channel; and in their turn, to set at defiance the corruptions of popery, and the supremacy of the pope. The bull Unigenitus, kindled the fire that rallied the parties to the contest. The power of the kings of France, had been from the time of Clovis, Pepin, and Charlemagne, inseparably interwoven with the supremacy of the pope: of course, Lewis XIV. supported the bull; the parliaments, the body of the nation, together with many of the higher, as well as the lower orders of the clergy, opposed the bull—and the nation was divided into two great parties; the pope and the king on one side, and the parliaments and the people upon the other; but the death of Lewis gave a check to the quarrel. The licentiousness which the duke of Orleans introduced at court, and diffused through the nation, diverted the quarrel, until Lewis XV. came to the throne. The arbitrary spirit of Lewis, led him to espouse the cause of the pope, and the Jesuits; parliaments as warmly espoused the cause of the people. Arbitrary power united in the pope and king, together with the absurd superstitions of the church of Rome, became the subjects of dispute.

Here, as in all such controversies, was displayed the extremes of the passions; liberty was arrayed against tyranny, licentiousness against superstition, and science and philosophy, against ignorance and corruption: the conflict was violent; Lewis pushed his powers to the extreme; the parliaments were firm ; Lewis dissolved the parliaments ; their spirit was unbroken ; the people clamored ; one Francis Damien, (a fanatic) stabbed the king ; this brought him to his senses : he recovered of the wound, and restored the parliaments. They now triumphed in their turn ; they demanded that the Jesuits, who had caused the quarrel, should be suppressed : Lewis complied, abolished their order, gave them up to civil prosecutions, and banished them from France. The corruptions of their institute were discovered, and exposed to the world ; their colleges were seized ; their estates confiscated ; and they became the reproach of the world.

Elated with this great victory, the parliaments attempted to limit and humble the crown. They not only refused to register certain obnoxious edicts of the king : but commenced prosecutions against such authorities as dared to oppose them : here they were at issue again, and the contest continued.

CHAP. VII.

Jansenists and Jesuits ; assembly of the States-General ; Revolution opened ; Paris becomes one great mob : the king a cypher ; flight of the king ; convention formed ; new Constitution.

IN the midst of the disputes in France about liberty and prerogative, died Lewis XV. and was succeeded by Lewis XVI. 1774. The great parties which sprang up in the reign of Lewis XIV. and distracted the reign of Lewis XV. still raged in France. The dispute of the Jansenists and Jesuits about free grace, free will, &c. had called forth the pens of the most learned religious writers—the cause of liberty, against civil and ecclesiastical tyranny, called forth also the pens of the learned of all classes, excited a general attention and inquiry through the nation ; and all descriptions of character became party in the quarrel.

The American Revolution, gave a diversion to the violence of the contest, for a time ; when that was closed, it raged with renewed violence ; the abolition of the parliament had only increased the flame, until the people, impatient of all further restraint, were resolved to govern themselves.

They accordingly assembled at Versailles, on the 5th of May, 1789, a general députatoin from all the sections of France, under the denomination of the States-General, and assumed a share in the government; and on the 16th of June, they resolved themselves into a national assembly. Overawed in some measure by the Swiss guards of the crown, they saw the necessity of a military force—they resolved that 48,000 citizens should be enrolled as national guards, and in two days 270,000 men were enrolled in the city of Paris. These were without arms; they seized on all the depots of arms that fell in their way; an immense mob assaulted the hospital of invalids, took 30,000 muskets, and 20 pieces of cannon; and they intercepted all the couriers of the court, and disclosed their dispatches. Flushed with these successes, the national assembly sent a députation to the king, with a demand that the large body of troops posted in the Champ de Mars, should be withdrawn—the king replied, “I have already made known to you the measures the disorders of Paris have obliged me to adopt; I alone have the right to judge of the necessity, and in that respect can make no change;” the troops however withdrew in the night.

On the next day, June 14th, the people, still in quest of arms, went to the bastile, and sent a small députation to the governor, who were admitted; soon a firing commenced in the prison—this enraged the populace; they flew to the bastile, with a strong military force; the governor fired on the mob with cannon and grape; this threw the populace into a rage—an assault commenced, the governor displayed the white flag; a parley ensued, and a second députation was admitted, and a second firing commenced within the prison. This became a signal of general assault; a violent conflict ensued, the prison was forced, the governor was massacred, the principal officers were executed, and their heads exhibited on poles throughout the city of Paris. The prisoners were set at liberty, and the keys carried to the national assembly; they decreed the destruction of the bastile. This was immediately executed, amidst the excesses of those passions which fired the populace to take vengeance on the objects of their hatred and fury. This violent triumph over this detested rod of despotism, diffused a general spirit of enthusiasm through the nation, and may be called the tocsin of that liberty, which eventually changed the political character of France. The king, alarmed at this outrage, repaired the next day to the hall of the assembly, and by a speech, attempted to soothe the violence of the proceedings.

The die was cast, negotiation was at an end, violence had commenced, blood had been spilt, and the nation was in arms. The explosion had disclosed the passions which had been ripening for nearly half a century; and had opened the field of harvest for those seeds, which were sown in the reign of Lewis XIV. The princes of the blood, with many of the nobles of church and state, alarmed for their safety, fled into voluntary banishment. Fired with resentment at this, the populace took vengeance on such as remained, cut off their heads, and exposed them in triumph on poles through the streets—August 4.

The assembly decreed the inviolability of the king, freedom of opinion in matters of religion, liberty of speech, liberty of the press, and the rights of man; and abolished all privileged orders, August 15. At this time the alarm became general; the king sent the plate of the crown to the mint; the assembly sent the plate of the church to the mint; a national guard of 60,000 men, conducted the king from Versailles to Paris, and lodged him in the palace of the Thuilleries: the same night the assembly sent him a deputation with the declaration of the rights of man, which the king accepted.

Nov. 1.—The assembly decreed the abolition of all letters de cachet, and all arbitrary imprisonments, all distinction of orders, and the confiscation of ecclesiastical estates; a free toleration in religion, with an equality of privileges. These violent proceedings in such rapid succession, alarmed the friends of the crown, and led them to attempt a union of effort, to check this mad career, rescue the king and government from this licentiousness, and restore the authority of the crown. This effort existed only in name, and served only to inflame the populace. The system had long been matured, and every means was regularly seized to progress the plan. A government was now fixed in the national assembly; a military force was formed, and armed; the bastille was destroyed by violence, without opposition; the king was no better than a prisoner, or cypher in his palace, his prerogative was set at defiance, with the decree of the rights of man.

That clergy, which had so violently assisted the crown to enforce the bull Unigenitus, were now stripped of their power, by the act of free toleration, and the confiscation of their estates. Money was now wanting; this it would not do to supply by taxes on the people: assignats, or paper money was issued, and the Jews of Spain, Portugal, and Avignon were decreed citizens of France, January, 1790, and their extra taxes abolished; the civic oath was administered to the king, and the whole city of Paris; all religious cloisters were abolished forever, and their estates confiscated; the minister Neckar sent in his resignation to the assembly; they decreed a monument to be erected to the memory of J. J. Rosseau, and that his widow and family be supported at the public expense. These were the outlines of the proceedings of the assembly this year; the violent agitation of the public mind generally, and the distractions of the city of Paris particularly, can never be described.

April, 1791.—The king attempted to go with his family to St. Cloud, to pass the easter holydays: a violent tumult ensued; here, for the first time, Lewis realized that he was a prisoner in his palace: here, for the first time, the marquis La Fayette began to realize, that it was easier to excite the popular tumult, than to control it; and that what he and his friends had contemplated, as a reform in the government, had become a revolution, irresistible and uncontrolable.

The king was compelled to return to the Thuilleries, under a strong guard. The complaints of the king, to the assembly, produced no more effect, than the remonstrances of the marquis La Fayette to the mob. The king was a prisoner, the government subverted, and the efforts of man, could not control the violence of the tornado.

The minister at war announced to the assembly, that the emigrants were assembled on the frontier, to invade France; that they had been reviewed by the prince of Conde, that their uniform was black, faced with yellow, and their motto—"Conquer or die." This inflamed the assembly and the nation like a shock of electricity, they decreed the ashes of Voltaire worthy the Pantheon; the populace assembled in the Palais Royal in Paris, and burnt the pope in effigy; the violence of the new principles were now displayed, Voltaire was deified, and the pope consumed. This was in miniature the triumph of the old praties, the fall of superstition, and the triumph of philosophy; but the triumph of the sword of Charlemagne was yet behind the curtain—this was in the hands of a set of men who had not yet disclosed it.

The king, aware of the eventful crisis, attempted to convey his family in a secret flight to Montmedy, a strong town on the north of France ; he was recognized on his way, at Varennes, arrested by the populace, and conducted back to Paris, under an escort of 30,000 men, and again committed to the Thuilleries, June 29. Placards were posted upon the walls of Paris : "Whoever shall applaud the king, shall be soundly cudgelled : whoever shall insult the king, shall be hanged." The general alarm was great ; but the escort was conducted with great solemnity, and the national assembly became permanent. They sent a deputation to the king, to inquire into the cause of his departure ; and the king assured them it was not his intention to leave the kingdom, but only to reside at Montmedy, until the nation became tranquil, and the constitution settled ; and remonstrated against the riotous abuse the queen received from the mob, in Paris, and expressed his anxiety for her safety. The queen replied, that she only accompanied her family and husband to a place of more safety. The ashes of Voltaire, were, according to the decree, removed to St. Genevieve, July 17. This movement of the king, had kindled anew the flames of the revolution.—Robespierre appeared in the Champ de Mars, at the head of a vast multitude, who petitioned for the king to be dethroned. At this eventful crisis, the famous convention took place, between the emperor Leopold, and the king of Prussia.

August 1.—The minister at war announced that the emigrants, to the amount of 8,000, were assembled upon the Meuse and Moselle, under the prince of Conde, and were supported by another body of 10,000, headed by the two brothers of the king. The spirit of liberty was now sown in the island of St. Domingo : the colonial assembly decreed the liberty of the mulattoes to the floor of their assembly. This produced great confusion, and became the cause of great contention. In this state of things, the new constitution of France, was finished, and presented to the king, by a deputation of sixty members, September 14 ; and the assembly decreed, that the constitution be solemnly published throughout France.

lans and Jacobins—Decrees of the National Assembly—Treaty of Vienna—Riots in Paris—Coalition—Duke of Brunswick—Flight of the King.

THE king received the constitution, and repaired immediately to the hall of the National Assembly to sign it. He closed his memorable speech, on this occasion, with these words: "I come, solemnly to consecrate my acceptance of the constitutional code; and I swear to be faithful to the nation and the laws, and to employ all the power with which I am entrusted, to maintain the constitution decreed by the National Assembly, and to cause the laws to be executed. May this great and memorable epoch, be the cause of re-establishing peace and union, and become the basis of the welfare of the people, and the prosperity of the empire."

The burst of applause which filled all parties upon the occasion, cannot be described. A grand festival was given in the Champs Elises; "One hundred thousand citizens danced upon the occasion; and at the distance of every hundred yards, was constructed a highly illuminated orchestra, where the musicians played: and the air resounded, every half-hour, with the discharge of one hundred and thirty pieces of cannon, placed on the banks of the Seine. On a tree, planted on the old scite of the Bastile, was displayed the following inscription. Here is the epoch of Liberty. We dance on the ruins of Despotism. The Constitution is finished. Long live Patriotism." The constituent assembly closed September 30.

October 1.—The legislative assembly was organized under the new constitution, and sat, for the first time. The king of the French, despatched letters to all the emigrant princes, conjuring them to return to France. They had carried with them into exile, the seeds of the old quarrel: they were not cordial to this new order of things, it went to destroy all their power; and they refused to return. The count De Artois declared, that they had taken up arms to restore the Roman Catholic religion, and its ministers, and to give the king his liberty and authority. The assembly passed a decree to compel the emigrants to return; this the king refused to sanction. The flames of liberty were now kindled in St. Domingo, and the mulattoes burnt three hundred houses. We come now to the eventful period which discloses the main-spring which set the vast machine in motion, and appeared openly to regulate and control all its movements and operations.

A society of Moderates styled Feuillans, was formed, and began to diffuse their influence and sentiments, to regulate the government—this society breathed the opinions of reform, not revolution, in government ; limited monarchy, not a republican system, such as the Marquis La Fayette and others contemplated. This club called into view the jacobin club—this originated in an assemblage of about 40 literary gentlemen in the lifetime of Voltaire, and in the reign of Lewis XV. for the purpose of diffusing general information in France, and to counteract the corrupt and despotic power of popish superstition, and through the means of a more general knowledge, to rouse up the nation to a sense of their rights, and of their power, and through the medium of these, to open the way for France to recover all her ancient greatness.

The club of the moderates were opposed to this, and the jacobins were then forced from their concealment. They assembled regularly, their numbers were small, but their names had great weight and these gave strength, and added numbers to the club ; it soon bore down and destroyed the moderates. The great plan of this club was, to discuss such questions as were most likely to claim the attention of the national assembly, and through this medium, influence and control that body. To render this the more effectual, a regular president, secretary, &c. were chosen, and the debates conducted with the greatest regularity. Auditors were admitted into the galleries, who caught the spirit of the club, and by their applause, proclaimed it through the nation—the influence of this club became great, bore down all other clubs, and gave law to the nation.

At this eventful crisis appeared Condorcet's manifesto, addressed to all states and nations : the national assembly decreed it and presented it to the king—two sentences of this will be a sufficient sample of the whole : " Peace, which imposture, intrigue, and treason have banished, will never cease to be our first wishes. France will take up arms, compelled to do so, for her internal peace and safety ; she will be seen to lay them down with joy, the moment she is assured, that there is nothing to fear for that liberty, for that equality, which is now the only element in which Frenchmen can live." Condorcet was a jacobin, and here disclosed the sum of the whole matter, which had been so long concealed, and in concealment wrought such astonishing effects.

The compact for a military republic was formed, and the king was like Charles I. of England, only a cloak or tool, for this club to work with. January 1, 1792, the assembly passed a decree against the emigrant princes--the king of Prussia publicly declared, "that Lewis XVI. having accepted the new constitution prevented his acting in his defence." The affairs of the revolution began now to excite a general alarm throughout Europe--they all knew what France once was, and what she had not ceased in her efforts to become again, viz. the empire of the west--they dreaded a military republic in the heart of Europe, armed with all the resources, military experience, and wild enthusiasm of France; they prepared to do something, and at the same time knew not what to do--if they lay idle, they feared the union and strength France might gain, in ripening her plans--if they made a movement, they feared that it might endanger the king, and drive the nation to union for their common safety, and kindle with violence the torch of war. The king of Bohemia and king of Prussia entered into a secret treaty to prepare for the worst. February 20th, the national assembly published, through their ambassadors, to all the courts of Europe, "France renounces all armaments with a view of making conquests, and will never employ her forces against the liberty of any state." The secret treaty of Vienna was soon known to France, and excited alarm.

Lewis XVI. to secure his own safety, wrote immediately to the emperor: "I demand of the king of Bohemia, an entire renunciation of all coalition and armament against France; and I declare to him, that if he does not do this, the king will regard him from the present, as in a state of war." The emperor died in 36 hours, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Francis II. He immediately, through his minister announced to the world, that he had adopted the political system of the emperor his father. A general change took place in the French ministry. At this time, the English government abolished slavery; and count Ankerstrom assassinated Gustavus III. king of Sweden.

A new court of inquisition commenced in France at this time, known by the name of the revolutionary tribunal: nothing like this had appeared since the inquisition of old; and a new instrument of death was invented, called the guillotine, (from the name of the inventor.) These enthusiastic sons of liberty, who had inveighed so bitterly against the overbearing persecutions of the pope and the crown, were now in their turn become the instruments of a persecution, tenfold more bitter and bloody than either; not for orthodoxy in religion, but under the sanction of the sacred name of liberty. They had yet to learn, that the maxim of "compel them to come in," was as cruel and unjustifiable in social, as in religious rights; and that the maxim when applied to liberty, can no more be justified, than when applied to the bull Unigenitus, or the Alcoran.

The jacobins had carefully originated a new system of logic, which served as a smoothing plane for the violation of every moral principle, and at once destroyed all the sympathies of the heart. "The end justifies the means:" a worse, or more dangerous principle than this, never existed amidst the wilds of Gothland; and the ravages which marked the overthrow of the western Roman Empire, with all their exterminating train, were never founded upon a maxim so corrupt as this; but upon their savage usages of war, in disposing of conquest.

June 20.—A mob in Paris of 100,000 men, armed with muskets and artillery, assaulted the palace of the king, in order to compel him to come in to their measures, and sanction two decrees which he had declined. The gates were thrown open, the mob entered the palace; they presented to the king the red cap of liberty, on the end of a pike; he took it, put it on, and the queen with great good humour, distributed ribbands and May branches amongst the mob, as they passed through the apartments, to the number of 40,000 men in arms. The king the next day issued a proclamation concerning these tumults, and complained of the violence done by the mob. Francis II. at this time, was elected emperor of Germany at Frankfort, 1792—and the king announced to the national assembly, that a Prussian army of 52,000 men, were on their march against France. July 9.—The minister for foreign affairs announced, that Germany, Russia, Turin, Naples, Rome, Spain and Portugal, had conspired against France; the assembly decreed the nation in danger, and denounced fifty-seven persons as guilty of high treason. The duke of Brunswick published a clear, and laconic manifesto.

The king, alarmed at this manifesto, addressed a letter to the president of the national assembly; disclaimed all connection with this movement, and declared, "that it was to the nation that he owed himself—and that he was one, and the same with her." At the same sitting, Petion, at the head of the commonalty of Paris, appeared at the bar of the assembly, and demanded, "that the king be excluded from the throne, and a ministerial government be appointed, until a new king should be chosen." This threw off the mask, the king now realized his fate, he saw before him the grave of Charles I.; he again attempted to escape in the garb of a peasant; but was recognized by a centinel, and secured. Here appeared the result of the federation in the Champ de Mars, of the 18th of July. Their deputation now appeared at the bar of the assembly, August 10, bearing a petition, signed by thousands of citizens, preceded by a pike, bearing a red woolen cap, with this label: "Deposition of the king."

Alarmed for his immediate safety, the king, attended by his Paris guards, the queen, his sister, and the royal children, took his seat by the side of the president, and said: "I am come amongst you to prevent a horrible crime, convinced that while here I am safe."

CHAP. IX.

Mob of the 10th of August—bold measures of the Assembly—Dunourier—La Fayette—Massacres—National Convention—Trial of Lewis XVI.—Condemnation.

THE materials, which had long been collecting, now took fire, and involved the whole city of Paris in the explosion. The collection of the mob, on the morning of the 10th of August, together with the alarming rage of the populace, rendered it necessary for the king to take this step. Acts of open violence soon commenced: the mob attacked the Swiss guards at the palace—the guards made a firm resistance; the conflict became desperate; a horrible carnage ensued; and the guards were shot down and butchered almost to a man. About 25,000 fell in this horrible massacre. The mob entered the palace in triumph, and with unrestrained fury burst open the apartments, carried off the treasures of the queen, overthrew the statutes of Lewis XIV. and XV. and laid them in ruins; and when they had wreaked their vengeance on these monuments of their kings, and laid waste, by their ravages, this sanctuary of royalty—they retired and dispersed.

This horrid scene filled all Paris with terror and consternation: the national assembly were shocked with the outrage, and caught the general alarm: some members trembled for their own safety; others retired, or absented themselves. In the midst of this scene of distress, they ordered the roll of the house to be called—decreed, and took the following oath: “I swear, in the name of the nation, to maintain Liberty and Equality, or die at my post.” They also decreed, “that the French people be invited to call a national convention;” and “that as the executive power was provisionally suspended, the six ministers now in power, shall become the executive, and present the plan for appointing a governor for the young prince royal; and that the king and royal family remain under the protection of the assembly, be considered as under the safeguard of the law, and their defence be entrusted to the national guards of Paris. They denounced as traitors and infamous, all who should quit their posts; and ordered these decrees to be proclaimed to all Paris, and throughout the eighty-three departments. These bold measures, were received with general applause, through the nation; and produced a torrent of addresses to the assembly, of plaudits and congratulations. The ministers, who floated upon the top of the popular tide at this time, were Danton, Le Brun, Roland, Servon, Monge and Claviere. The royal family was next removed from the convent of the Feuillans, (or moderates,) and confined in the temple; and the marquis La Fayette moved his army towards Paris, in order to arrest the violent proceedings against the royal family: but alas! it was now too late! He had now to learn in his turn, that it was easier to raise, than to control popular tumult.

The assembly, apprised of his movement, decreed his arrest, and sent a deputation to enforce the decree: the marquis caused the deputation to be arrested and imprisoned. This enraged the assembly; and they decreed, that the marquis La Fayette be brought, dead or alive, to the bar of the Assembly. This decree alarmed the marquis, and he fled into Germany; he was seized at Rochfort, by the Austrian general, and sent to Namur, and from thence to the strong fortress of Olmutz, in Moravia, where he was attended by his wife and daughter, through a long and distressing confinement.

General Dumourier, who had preceded the marquis in the command, had also attempted a compromise, to save the royal family, been denounced, and commissioners sent to arrest, and bring him before the bar of the assembly : these he arrested, and sent to the Austrian general, as hostages for the safety of the king, and threw himself upon the mercy of the emperor of Germany. These two champions of the revolution, now felt the truth of what marshal Ney afterwards said to the emperor Napoleon—"Sire, revolutions never go back." The tornado had now acquired such force, that all who attempted to arrest its course, became like a feather in a tempest—they were swept away.

We come now, to the memorable second of September. A decree of the assembly, requiring that all the clergy should take the civic oath, had been but partially complied with : this opened the way for vengeance to fall upon the old quarrel of Jansenist and Jesuit, with all the bitterness and violence of party. A general riot commenced in Paris—another horrid massacre commenced ; one ex-bishop, and about one hundred nonjuring priests were butchered ; the prisons were all violated, the debtors released, and a general political massacre prevailed. Three or four thousand stained the annals of France with their blood, on this memorable day, under the sanction of the mob, styled Septemberisers. The trophy of this infuriated mob of barbarians, was the mangled body of the princess De Lamballe, borne in triumph to the temple, and exposed to the view of the royal family, with her head elevated upon a pole, and presented before the window of their apartment. The assembly passed a silent decree of approbation and applause, upon this murderous scene, by an oath, "that they held royalty in detestation ; and swore, that no king or monarch, should ever be a stain upon the liberties of the people."

At this time, fifty-four national prisoners of distinction, were arrested at Orleans ; and on their way to Saumur, they passed through Versailles, where they were attacked by the populace, and all butchered : the principal among the sufferers, were, the duke of Brisac, and the bishop of Maudes : and on the same day, ninety priests were butchered at St. Fermin. These massacres of the clergy were frequent and numerous in Paris, and throughout France, at this time.

The assembly decreed, that the marriage covenant might be dissolved at the request of either party, as upon the simple allegation of incompatibility of temper, in either party, or other grounds.

The declaration of war on the part of the German empire, against France, was announced by the minister of foreign affairs: and the assembly declared war against Sardinia. A new epoch was then announced in this scene of horror; the convention had been elected, and were then formed in the palace of the Thuilleries: M. Gregoire, bishop of Blois, at the head of twelve commissioners, said: "Citizens, the convention is constituted, and we are deputed to announce to you, that it is about to repair here to commence its sittings." The president then said—"The legislative assembly declares its sitting closed."

October 9, 1792.—The national convention opened its decrees, with death against all emigrants. The subject of a new constitution next claimed their attention, and they appointed a committee to frame one, and present it to the convention: this committee was composed of sixteen; at their head, stood the noted names of Sieyes, Thomas Paine, Brissot, Danton, Condorcet, &c. At the motion of Barrere, (one of the members of this committee,) a decree was passed, "inviting all the friends of liberty and equality, to present to the committee, in any form, and in any language whatever, the plans, methods, or means, which they thought the best calculated to form a good constitution for the French republic;" passed with this addition—"Whoever shall attempt to establish royalty, or any other system of government, derogatory to the sovereignty of the French people, shall be punished with death." The eventful period, for which the national body was organized, was now arrived: the necessary previous steps had been taken; the public mind was now prepared; and the unfortunate Lewis XVI. called to the bar of the convention, to pass through the awful scenes of Charles I. of England, before the mock parliament. Upon his approach, the president thus addressed the king:—

"Lewis, the French nation accuses you: the convention decreed, on the 3d of December, that you should be tried by itself: on the 6th it was decreed that you should be brought to the bar: they are about to read to you the act, which announces the crimes imputed to you. You may sit down."

The accusation was then read, in the usual form, and the king interrogated upon each charge, by the president—what he had to say in his own defence? At the close, the king replied—"I desire a copy of the act of accusation, as well as of all papers intended to serve as proofs against me, and that I may be allowed council in my defence." Lewis was then permitted to retire; and after some debate, his request was granted, and counsel allowed. Messrs. Tronchet and Lemoignon de Malesherbes, became counsel for the king; the latter an old man of seventy-eight. The prosecution against the unhappy monarch of France, was conducted in due form; and on the 17th of January, 1793, his punishment was determined by an appel nominal; (the question was put to each member, and his answer noted.)

The president then announced that the number of votes, was 721.

Impressed with the solemnity of the scene, the president then rose, took off his hat, and declared, in a low and solemn tone of voice, "the punishment pronounced by the convention, against Lewis Capet, is death." Philip, duke of Orleans, a relative of Lewis XVI. was a member of the convention, and gave his vote, death: but Thomas Paine, voted only for banishment. This is that Philip, duke of Orleans, who requested the convention to give him a new name; and received that of Philip Egalite, (or equality.) The fate of the king was announced on the 20th of January, 1793; all Paris was illuminated, and no person permitted to appear abroad; the whole city was buried in the most solemn silence, and the military in large bodies patrolled the streets.

Execution of Lewis XVI.—violence of the convention—Char-

DEATH OF LEWIS XVI.

January 21st, 1793, agreeably to a vote of the National Convention, Lewis 16th was brought to the scaffold, attended by a military escort, and an immense concourse of people. He attempted to speak, but was prevented by a flourish of music, and a cry of "No speeches! No speeches!" Seeing his last hope cut off, he exclaimed—"I forgive my enemies—may God forgive them, and not lay my innocent blood to the charge of the nation—God bless my people!" He then stretched himself upon the guillotine, and with great serenity met his fate.

lotte Corde—trial and execution of the Queen—triumphs of philosophy.

ON Monday, of the fatal, solemn, awful 21st, about two o'clock in the morning, the gloom of silence was here and there interrupted, by voices of lamentation in broken accents, expressing the distress of the feelings, and increasing the horrors of the gloom.

Lewis, with great composure and eminence of soul, passed Sunday in preparing for the solemn change. The morn of Monday came ; the queen, the princess royal, the dauphin, and madam Elizabeth, took their parting leave of the king. The distresses of this scene, may be realized by the sensibilities of a feeling, sympathizing heart, but can never be expressed by the pen. Lewis was calm, and possessed a dignified composure ; he retired for a few moments with his confessor, and devoted himself to the solemnities of religion. The stroke of eight from the Paris clock, announced the solemn hour ; the royal martyr was led forth to execution ; placed in a coach between two soldiers, (or gens de arms) he was conveyed to the place de la Revolution, amidst a large military escort, and an immense concourse of people. Lewis, with a firm step, ascended the scaffold, attended by his confessor, and several municipal officers ; with great complacency he beheld the multitude, and made an effort to address the spectators—but was stopped by an officer, who exclaimed, “ come, come, no speeches, no speeches :” this was accompanied by a flourish of music. Lewis saw at once that his last hope was cut off, and exclaimed—“ I forgive my enemies, may God forgive them, and not lay my innocent blood to the charge of the nation ; God bless my people”—he gave his affectionate blessing to his confessor, stretched himself upon the fatal guillotine, and with great serenity met his fate—12 o'clock, January 21, 1793.

Desperation now seized every department, and witnessed every measure in France. The nation was like a ship in the midst of a tempest, without a pilot, tossed with violence, and at the mercy of the waves, and the storm. The request of the unhappy king to be buried with his fathers, was treated by the convention with the silence of apathy ; and his body was thrown into a pit with quicklime, and consumed. One of the ex-king's guards, assassinated Le Pelletiere, one of the convention, whose vote against the king was death ; and the convention attended his funeral on the 24th. The sanguinary scene was opened afresh, and the convention in their turn began to bleed ; the righteous vengeance of heaven never spared them, until they had by their own blood, made some atonement for this outrage on the life of the king. Great heat and bitterness, now marked the proceedings of the convention. The barbarian Marat, outraged all common decency, in his attacks on the members in debate, with the opprobrious epithets of " incendiary, assassin, villain, scoundrel," &c. ; which called forth a decree, that " whoever should use such injurious language towards any member should be expelled." Marat denounced the framers of the decree, as conspirators. The convention were now at issue. The violence of those passions which had wreaked their rage and fury upon the unfortunate king, were now turned upon themselves. They denounced Condorcet as a traitor to his country, and he met his fate : to denounce and execute, were now synonymous terms. The famous Charlotte Corde, took vengeance on Marat, and sacrificed him upon the altar of her country, by stabbing him to the heart ; for which, she suffered death in her turn, by a decree of the revolutionary tribunal. The enthusiasm of this heroine may be learnt from her last words : " 'Tis guilt brings shame, not the scaffold."

During these distressing scenes in the interior of France, her armies under Gen. Dumourier and others had been successful ; the allies had moved with caution, lest they should endanger the life of the king : they advanced into Flanders ; laid siege to, and took Valenciennes. This enraged the convention, they denounced the queen, ordered her to be arrested, and conducted to prison ; August 1. The decree was executed the same night ; the queen was roused from her repose, and hurried in a most unfeeling manner from her family, to her place of confinement, a cell, a dungeon, eight feet square—and doomed to lodge on a couch of straw ! Struck with the horrors of the cell, she fell into a swoon, and passed the rest of the night in those violent struggles of nature, which threaten momentary dissolution. The approach of morn, witnessed the ravages of distress upon the graces of the queen : she lived ; but ah ! how changed. She languished in this horrid cell, until the 15th and 16th of the month, when she was summoned to her trial before this revolutionary tribunal, and after the usual forms of trial, the jury (after one hour) returned a verdict of guilty of all the charges alleged. The president then rose, and after the usual ceremonies pronounced the following sentence:—"The tribunal, after the unanimous declaration of the jury, in conformity to the laws cited, condemn the said Maria Antoniette, called of Lorrain and Austria, widow of Lewis Capet, to the penalty of death; her goods confiscated for the benefit of the republic: and this sentence shall be executed in the Place of the Revolution." The queen received this sentence with the same composure which she had supported through the whole scene. The trial spun out, through the night; and at half past 4 o'clock in the morning, the queen was re-conducted to her cell, in the prison La Conciergerie: no time was allowed her for reflection or repose; "at 5 o'clock the generale was beat—at 7 the whole armed force was on parade, cannon were planted upon the squares, and at the extremities of the bridges, from the palace, to the place La Revolution—at 10 o'clock, numerous patrols passed through the streets—at half past 11, the queen was brought out of her cell, dressed in a white dishabille; she was conducted to the place of execution in an open cart; her hair from behind was cut off; her hands were tied behind her back, and her back turned towards the horse: on her right sat the executioner; on her left, a constitutional priest," (or one who had taken the oath to support the constitution.) The queen passed to her execution, insensible to the shouts of Vive la Liberty, Abas la Tyrannie, Vive la Republic; she beheld with indifference, the vast military escort of 30,000 men, and the placards of liberty and equality, posted on the houses where she passed; she ascended the scaffold in some haste, cast her eyes upon the populace; with a look took leave of her palace, laid her head upon the guillotine, and met her fate at 12 o'clock, aged thirty-eight: the same place, and same hour, witnessed the death of her husband, just eight months and twenty-six days before. The executioner, according to the usual form, exhibited the head from the four corners of the stage; and the populace as usual, exclaimed, Vive la Republic, Vive la Liberty. Her body was thrown into a grave of quick-lime, in the same place and manner of her husband.

Thus fell Lewis XVI. thus fell Maria Antoniette—king and queen of France: victims to the same passions which commenced in the reign of Lewis XIV. which occasioned Lewis

XV. to dissolve his parliament, and which armed the knife of the assassin who stabbed the king, and by a wound restored the parliaments, and expelled the order of the jesuits. The same passions were rekindled ; and when transferred from the schools of the Jesuits, to the schools of the philosophers, were swelled into a mighty blaze, which inflamed the whole nation, and were now shedding torrents of blood, by the revolutionary tribunal, guided and controlled by the Jacobin club.

This club which commenced under the auspices and direction of the philosophers of France, had now become very numerous, embracing all the choice spirits of violence and corruption in the nation.

The king and queen were now dead ; and no longer the objects of that dread and hatred, which served as a rallying point, for the members of the revolutionary tribunal. The same fire of ambition and revenge, which destroyed the royal family, now commenced its ravages upon their own body.

The allies pushed the war in Flanders. England dismissed the French minister, and proclaimed war against France. Horror and alarm seized on the convention : Brissot, with twenty other members, were denounced as conspirators, and executed. The ravages of the revolutionary tribunal, were marked with blood, through the nation ; mobs, insurrections and massacres, rendered all France, one great theatre of carnage, and one dark scene of horror. The ravages of the guillotine, threatened to exterminate the clergy : all fled that could flee ; others resigned their ecclesiastical functions.

Gobert, bishop of Paris, with all his grand vicars, divested themselves, at the bar of the convention, of their letters of priesthood : Lindet and Gregoire followed their example.— Seventy persons were guillotined in one day at Lyons ; on the next day sixty-eight were shot, and eight guillotined.

An insurrection in La Vendee, now raged with violence ; and the French arms under general Turreu, ravaged the country. Philosophy now triumphed over religion, as well as over the clergy : the convention abolished all religion, and decreed, “ there is no God, and death is an eternal sleep.”

CHAP. XI.

Insurrection of La Vendee ; fall of Robespierre ; Grand Armistice of La Vendee ; Jacobin Insurrection ; death of Lewis the son of the king ; new constitution ; revolution in Holland.

THE war in La Vendee now claims some attention. The causes which produced these sanguinary and distressing scenes, were the triumph of philosophy over religion, and the triumph of philosophers over every vestige of moral virtue, and the moral sympathies.

They had announced that the clergy could never have raised this world and rendered it subservient to their dominion and control, if they had not fixed the lever upon the other world. They had now struck away all support of the lever, and announced no God ; and further, that death was an eternal sleep. That quiet after death, which had been purchased with so many pilgrimages, crusades, or holy wars—by whole lives of penitential self-denial, with the purchase of so much money to obtain the viaticum of the holy unction, was now rendered free to all, in the doctrine that “ death was an eternal sleep.”

The churches of religion became republican tribunes, where republican principles were to be preached, and the disciples of the philosophers to become the orators of the day. The national convention decreed, “ that the remains of Mirabeau should be removed from the Pantheon, and those of Marat be put in their place.”

Under the sanction of these feelings and these principles, the war raged in La Vendee. Five hundred royalists, prisoners in La Vendee, were shot by order of the commissioner Leguino ; the commissioners, Turreu and Prieur, announced to the convention a terrible action in La Vendee—six thousand slain, and three hundred driven into the Loire : this reign of Robespierre drenched the convention and the nation with blood.

January 1, 1794, Thomas Paine was arrested, and a deputation of Americans appeared at the bar of the convention to petition for his release ; and to shew him not guilty, but a true apostle of liberty.

Carrier made a report on the war in La Vendee, in which he stated that more than 400 leagues were in arms ; that the rebels were more than 150,000 ; that in one battle were slain more than 20,000 ; that 4 or 500 prisoners perished daily, either by shooting or drowning, and that some pits contained 5000." Their mode of drowning was to crowd the hold of vessels with prisoners, set them afloat on the river, scuttle the vessel, and let them sink.

At this time, the convention decreed the people of color, and blacks, in the French West India Colonies, all free.

A terrible denunciation fell on thirteen members of the convention, and was sealed with the guillotine; amongst the number were Danton, Lacroix, Phillippeaux. Robespierre triumphed again. That jealousy and ambition which raged throughout the nation, and marked its ravages with blood, still raged in the convention, and rendered that body an alcedama.

Old Malesherbes, who defended Lewis XVI. at the age of seventy-eight, was now convicted of corresponding with the enemy, and guillotined: and madam Elizabeth, sister to the king, met the same fate. Cecilia Regnault, imitating the example of Charlotte Corde, attempted to assassinate Robespierre, and Collot de Herbois, and met the fate of Charlotte Corde, the next day—July 27.

The cup of vengeance was now full; the tyranny of Robespierre and his party, had now become insupportable: the vials of wrath were ready to be poured out upon them; they were denounced, and their arrest ordered; a gens de arms attempted to seize the tyrant; he defended himself with a knife; a conflict ensued; he was subdued; an act of outlawry was passed against him; he was ordered for immediate execution, with Robespierre the younger, Couthon, St. Just, and fifteen or twenty others, creatures of the tyrant. Next in turn was arrested, Tinville, public accuser to the revolutionary tribunal.

In the midst of these revolutionary scenes of distress, the world was struck with a republican rhapsody from Geraud, upon the subject of national education. After observing that France was elevated upon the pinnacle of earthly splendor, that the eyes of mankind were fixed upon those doctrines and principles which had effaced the ignorance, degradation and slavery of fourteen centuries; that the slaves of despotism had been struck with a mortal terror; a protecting divinity had elevated her empire upon the smoking ruins of a throne, and on the bloody remnants of expiring factions; he exclaimed:—

“Mandatories of a great nation! Let us consecrate a durable monument to the rising generation; the Areopagus of Europe ought now to consolidate the majestic edifice of our immortal revolution, on the immoveable basis of public instruction. Before we abandon the helm of public affairs, let us announce to our constituents, with a true republican boldness, to France, to all Europe, that we contemplate with one inviolable maxim, that without public education, the empire of morals must be destroyed."

That system of education thus contemplated, ought to be in operation many centuries in France, to accomplish that degree of intelligence and information, amongst the lower classes of her citizens, which could enable her to support a republican government, even if she could be wholly divested of her monarchical prejudices and habits; and her philosophers, with all their boasted light and wisdom, ought to have known this, or if they did know it, they ought not to have built their ambitious schemes upon a foundation, which must of course swim in blood.

We have witnessed how the blood of the royal martyrs has again stained the convention.

The following extract of a letter from general Danicamp will shew, how the war raged in La Vendee. "I will prove that old men were murdered in their beds, that infants were murdered at their mother's breasts, and that pregnant women were guillotined. I will tell you in what place, at what time, and by whose orders, I have seen magazines of all kinds burned. The practice of drowning was not confined to Nantz, it extended thirty leagues up the Loire: I will demonstrate that the men who now assume the mask of philanthropy, were then the murderers." Immediately upon this, Carrier, commissioner in La Vendee, was arrested and executed, for the horrid cruelties practised by him in La Vendee.

February 19, 1795—An armistice was concluded in La Vendee, and Carnot presented to the convention a list of the principal victories obtained in La Vendee this campaign—viz: "twenty seven victories, of which eight were pitched battles: 121 actions of less importance; 80,000 enemies slain, 91,000 taken prisoners; 116 strong towns, or important places taken, 36 of them by siege or blockade; 230 forts or redoubts; 3800 pieces of cannon; 70,000 muskets; 1,000,000 lbs. of powder; and 90 pair of colors—all within the space of seventeen months."

May 5.—Fresh scenes of distress awaited the devoted city of Lyons, and she was again doomed to a most shocking massacre. The noted Tinvillè, (who prosecuted the queen) with his accomplices, were executed at Paris the 12th, and on the 20th a most terrible insurrection broke out in Paris, on the part of the jacobins to recover the blow they received by the fall of Robespierre. The deputy Ferrand was assassinated in the convention, and his head carried through the hall stuck upon a pole.

Nineteen persons were guillotined in Paris, for aiding in the insurrection of the 20th of May. At this time, died in his prison, Lewis, son of the late king Lewis XVI. aged 11 years. An address from the insurgent chiefs of La Vendee, to the king of England, expressive of their grateful recollection of the succor afforded them during their arduous struggle, and their hopes of future aid, shewed, that this insurrection was an effort of England, to weaken the arms of France. This, with other operations on the part of England, led to a numerous meeting at Copenhagen-house near London, to petition his majesty to discontinue the war.

At this eventful period, France opened a new scene : a new constitution was framed, adopted, and a new legislature were assembled Dec. 28; organized, and composed of a council of ancients, and a council of five hundred with an executive of five, called the directory, who were installed in Paris Nov. 1 ; the plan of this executive was, that each should reign in his turn. On the 26th of Dec. Charlotte Antoniette, daughter of Lewis XVI. was taken from the temple by the minister of the interior, conducted to his own hotel, and from thence sent to Vienna, where she arrived safe—1796.

At this time, parties ran high in England ; Charles Fox flattered the populace, and disturbed the government ; their majesties were insulted in the streets of London, and the mob abused the king's servants. A revolution had commenced in Holland ; the stadtholder had retired to England with his family, in January, 1795. The national convention of Holland was organized March 1, 1796, and citizen Paulus elected president. An extract of the order of procession will be a specimen of the genius of the Batavian Republic.—“Amongst other displays in this splendid procession, appeared a waggon covered with cloth so as to conceal its wheels, having three benches : on the hindermost, was seated an old man, bowed down with age, carrying a flag with this inscription :—‘ I lived in slavery ; but I rejoice in dying free. My posterity who are before me, will feel all the benefits.' On the bench before the old man were seated two aged women, who represented his daughters; and before them were two men with their children on their knees. The horses were led by four young men, the waggon was surrounded by six burgeoise with drawn swords, preceded by a herald carrying a banner, with this inscription: 'We will protect them that cannot protect themselves.' The powerful effect of such a display of address to the populace, is more readily felt than described."

The revolutionary principles which had spread into England, distressed the government; the military were in constant readiness to keep the peace: the government ordered a national fast. The chief in the insurrection of La Vendee, La charette, was taken prisoner, and shot April 1. Pichegru, who had succeeded La Fayette in Flanders, was now succeeded by Gen. Moreau, and prince Charles set out from Vienna to command the Austrian armies. Mr. Pitt brought forward his budget for a loan of 7,000,000, and Thomas Paine amused the French directory, with a pamphlet upon the decay and fall of the English system of Finance; which was ordered to be printed and distributed to all the members of the national council. On the 22d of June, the insurrection in La Vendee was wholly quelled, and the republic acknowledged.

CHAP. XII.

State of France—movements of the Armies—Napoleon Bonaparte—peace with Spain—Conquests in Italy—Milan.

WE have now reviewed in a cursory manner, the distresses of the interior of France, but have omitted the operations of the armies for a separate detail, that the events might not be blended together, and that the general occurrences might be more distinctly marked. The operations of the armies now claim some attention. The movements under generals Dumourier and La Fayette we have noticed, together with the appointment of gen. Pichegru. We have shewn the jacobin club to be the spring of all the movements of the national councils. We have shewn the origin of this revolutionary mob, how it grew into power, by overbearing and destroying the Feuillans, or moderates.

These two factions afterwards became blended in the club, and in the convention; they were restrained from open violence and hostility against themselves, during the life of the royal martyrs: but when these objects of their attention were removed, all restraint was withdrawn, and that balance of power, which marked the strength of the parties in their sentence upon the king, was at once turned upon itself.—These were distinguished by the appellation of Girondists, and the Mountain; of the latter, were Robespierre and the Jacobins.

Under this government, Dumourier carried the arms of France into the heart of Austrian Flanders, and subdued Belgium—watched, regulated, directed and controlled by commissioners from the jacobin faction, in the national council. These sowed the seeds of French philosophy, and French liberty, by establishing revolutionary clubs in every city they entered; these clubs inspired the conquered provinces, on all sides of France, to pour in their addresses to the national council, congratulating them upon their successes, and praying to be incorporated with the glorious republic.

In the midst of these flattering prospects, the scenes were changed—the low state of the finances of France called for supplies to conduct her ambitious plans and operations; the Jacobins compelled Dumourier to lay contributions in the conquered provinces; this excited alarm; these fell short of the pressing exigencies of the armies; they ordered him to rifle the churches, seize on the plate, and apply it to the use of the army; this struck a fatal blow—the Belgians had not yet immolated these altars to French philosophy, denounced their God, and buried their religion in the death of eternal sleep.

Fired with a just indignation, they resisted the outrage; and by the assistance of the Prussians, drove the French out of Belgium. To obviate this fatal rashness, as well as to save the king—Dumourier and La Fayette, attempted a compromise by negotiation; both fell a sacrifice to jacobin fury, and fled into exile. Gen. Pichegru, (who succeeded to the command in 1794,) sensible of the rock, on which both parties had split—by his popularity healed the breach, secured the conquest of the Low Countries, and penetrated into Holland. The Dutch, alarmed for their safety, inundated their country about Amsterdam, and made a firm resistance.

In the month of January, 1795, the frosts were so severe, that the ice became passible ; and Pichegru moved his army across into Amsterdam, and it fell an easy conquest to the French. With the fall of Amsterdam, the other provinces of Holland fell in quick succession : their Stadtholder and bank were removed to England, January, 1795, and on the 1st of March, the republic of Batavia was organized.

The factions in the French convention, kept the example of Cesar, in his triumph over the Roman republic, and the example of General Monk, in the restoration of Charles I. of England, as great reflecting mirrors, constantly before their eyes. To guard against a repetition of these examples, they kept their commissioners with their armies, to watch their generals. The successful campaign of general Pichegru, exposed him to this jealousy ; and he was regularly succeeded in command, by general Moreau—who was appointed by the convention, to lead the expedition of the French army upon the Rhine and Moselle.

General Jourdan was appointed to the command of another army on the Meuse. The object of these two armies was, to pursue the former plans of France in their wars—(as far back as Francis I.) to penetrate into Germany, form a junction upon the Danube, and march down to Vienna, and there form a junction with another army, destined to penetrate by the way of Italy and the Tyrol. The command of this third army was entrusted to general Bonaparte, who was raised to this important command, at the age of twenty-five.

As this campaign was one of the most important the French had then ever witnessed, on the side of Italy, I will give a short sketch of the origin of this young hero of France.

Napoleon Bonaparte, was born on the island of Corsica, in the year 1769 ; he received his education, partly in France, and partly in Padua, in Italy, at the military school : he entered the French service, as a military adventurer, and passed without much notice, until the famous massacre of Paris, on the 10th of August ; here he so distinguished himself by his coolness and firmness, in protecting the directory, that they raised him to the command of the army of Italy. When he had accepted the trust, he was thus interrogated by some friends : “ Are you not too young a man to take the command upon so distant an expedition ? ” to which the young general replied—“ I shall be older when I come back.”

Spain, at this time, made a part of the coalition against France. General Bonaparte made a sudden movement with his army towards Spain, crossed the Pyrenees, entered the northern provinces, without much opposition, settled a separate peace, returned into France, and pursued his march into Italy. On the plains of Montenotte, he gained his first victory, over General Bolieu; his second victory over the united Austrians and Piedmontese at Millesimo; and his third, at Mondovi, over the same forces; and he announced to the directory, the capture of twenty-one stands of colors. The following extract of an address, published by general Bonaparte, to the municipalities of Milan and Pavia, may serve as a specimen of the artful policy of general Bonaparte.

“The sciences, which do honor to the human mind; and the arts, which embellish human life, and transmit illustrious actions to posterity, should be peculiarly respected in all free governments. All men of Genius, all who have obtained a distinguished rank in the republic of letters are Frenchmen, whatever may be the country in which they were born. The states of Milan did not enjoy the consideration to which they were entitled: inclosed in the recesses of their laboratories, they esteemed themselves happy, if the kings and priests were good enough to do them no harm. At this day, it is not so: opinions are free in Italy. Inquisitions, intolerance, and despots are no more.

“I invite the learned to assemble, and to propose to me, their views, their names, or the assistance they may want, to give new life and existence to the sciences and fine arts. All those who may be desirous of going to France, shall be received with distinction by the government. The people of France, set a greater value upon the acquisition of a learned mathematician, a painter of reputation, or any distinguished man, whatever may be his profession, than in the possession of the richest, and most abundant city. Be you then, citizens, the organ of these sentiments, to all persons in the Milanese, distinguished for their learning.”

The effects of this popular stroke were best expressed by the exhibition of popular applause, which witnessed his triumphant entry into the city of Milan. Gen. Bonaparte was met by a deputation of the council general, who presented him with the keys; the deputation, with the arch bishop at their head accompanied by the magistrates and noblesse, with their splendid equipages, followed the general in grand procession, as he advanced into the city of Milan, preceded by a large detachment of infantry, and his guards—the national guard of the Milanese closed the procession.

This procession moved with great order to the archducal palace, as the quarters of the general, where he was entertained with a grand dinner of two hundred covers ; French and Italian music graced the scene with alternate airs—vive la liberty, vive la republic filled the great square around the tree of liberty. The ladies of Milan, dressed in the national colours of France, gave splendor to a ball, which closed this scene of general hilarity. General Bonaparte moved to Verona ; he also seized on Loretto and Ancona, cities of the papal dominions, and at the same time, concluded an armistice with the king of Naples—which the general announced to the directory.

CHAP. XIII.

Battle of Castiglione—bridge of Lodi—panic of the 4000—siege of Mantua—campaign of the Rhine, Meuse and Moselle—victories of prince Charles—fall of Kehl—of Mantua.

AN action commenced at Castiglione, which lasted five days successively ; the Austrians and Italians were commanded by old field mareschal Wurmser, in which the French were victorious ; 70 field pieces, with all their cassions, 6000 killed and wounded, and 15,000 prisoners, were the trophies of this victory.

At the bridge of Lodi, the Austrians had planted a strong park of artillery, resolved to make a firm resistance, and check the French. At sight of the enemies, general Bonaparte ordered the charge ; the order was obeyed ; the destructive fire of grape shot caused the French to halt at the bridge, and shew some disorder ; general Bonaparte advanced, seized a standard, and exclaimed, “ follow your general :” the bridge and whole park of artillery were carried ; the Austrians were broken, and put to flight, and the victory was complete. An adroitness of general Bonaparte at the close of this action, will serve to shew the power of his military fame, and the general panic of the enemy. General Bonaparte repaired after the action to the village of Lonado, with 1200 of his guards, to reconnoiter the enemy ; a body of 4000 Austrians which had been severed from the main army, appeared at Lonado, and summoned the place; general Bonaparte returned for answer—"Go and tell your general that the commander of the army of Italy is here, with his brave troops; and that if he with his division do not lay down their arms in eight minutes, he, with all the general officers, shall be responsible for the insult, and be sacrificed without mercy." The whole column of 4000 surrendered immediately. At this time, his holiness alarmed for the safety of the ecclesiastical states, published an edict prohibiting all maledictions against Frenchmen.

After the decisive action of Castiglione, general Wurmser fell back into Mantua, and secured his retreat in this strong fortress, which is the great key between Italy and the Tyrol: this movement prevented general Bonaparte from penetrating to Vienna. General Berthier, in the name of the commander in chief, summoned the governor of Mantua to surrender—and received for answer; "July 17.—The laws of honour and duty, compel me to defend to the last extremity, the place entrusted to me. I have the honor, &c."

The general successes of the armies, had excited throughout France general energies. The government and the nation had recovered a general tranquillity; and the general joy these had diffused, was expressed by a grand celebration at Paris of the memorable fall of Robespierre. With the fall of Robespierre, fell the bloody sovereignty of jacobinism.

At this time a division of the French army entered Leghorn, and seized property to the amount of eight millions of livres. Aug. 14.—General Bonaparte gained three actions over the Austrians, at Coronna, Montebaldo, and Proabolo; and pushed his victories to Roveredo. These victories destroyed, with a terrible carnage, the army sent to the relief of Mantua. Again, on the 16th of September, he was successful at the action of Cavela. During the siege of Mantua, general Marmont, aid-de-camp to general Bonaparte, was announced, and presented to the directory by the minister at war, who by an address pronounced this eulogy: "Posterity will scarcely credit the evidence of history, that in one campaign, all Italy was conquered; that three armies were successively destroyed; that upwards of 50 stands of colours remained in the hands of the victors; that 40,000 Austrians laid down their arms; in fine, that 30,000 Frenchmen, under a general of twenty-five years old, had accomplished all this."

During these operations of the armies, England sent lord Malmsbury to Paris, to arrest the progress of the French arms by a peace ; the negociation failed, and he returned to London, October 26.

During the memorable siege of Mantua, the emperor of Germany sent down two armies, to co-operate with the garrison for the relief of Mantua : these were destroyed in the battles last mentioned. A third army from Vienna now appeared, composed of recruits and volunteers, all young men, the flower of Austria. To give spirit, dignity and energy to this enterprise, the empress presented one regiment of volunteers with a standard, wrought with her own hands. General Wurmser commenced a sortie with the garrison, to co-operate with this army ; he was too soon, his sortie was repelled. General Bonaparte next turned his whole attention to the advancing army ; they were destroyed with a dreadful carnage. The king of Naples made terms with the conqueror of Italy, and signed a peace. Mantua was now closely invested.

We will next turn our attention to the armies of the Rhine, Meuse and Moselle, under the command of generals Moreau, and Jourdan, and opposed by the hero of Austria, prince Charles. On the 26th of June, general Moreau crossed the bridge at Strasburg with his army, took the strong fortress of Kehl, and advanced into Suabia, to meet prince Charles. At Renchen he gained a very considerable victory, and took 1200 prisoners from the Austrians, June 28. On the 9th of July, general Moreau defeated prince Charles near Ettingen in a severe action : the Austrians retired, and the French pursued, and on the 18th advanced with rapid strides into the heart of Germany. This alarmed the duke of Wirtemberg, and brought him to such terms, as occasioned a suspension of arms between him and general Moreau. This successful general concluded at the same time an armistice with the margrave of Baden ; continued to pursue prince Charles, crossed the river Neckar, and made peace with the circle of Suabia. General Jourdan penetrated into Germany, upon the Meuse, at the same time, took the city of Frankfort, and levied a contribution of six million of livres in cash, and two million in supplies, July 22. At the same time the strong fortress of Koenighoffen surrendered to a division of Jourdan's army, commanded by general Lefebre. August 5, general Moreau met with a check from prince Lichtenstein, near Kirchein ; this he recovered by an attack upon Neresheim, the Austrians were routed, and the French carried the place.

Alarmed at these rapid strides of France in Italy and Germany, the emperor issued a proclamation to all his subjects, to rally round the standard of their country, their constitution, and the laws, and thus concluded : "Behold the still smoking ruins of Italy, the excesses and most inhuman cruelties committed there ! Behold the devastation which the once flourishing territories of Germany have suffered, inundated by the armies of the enemies, and you cannot remain dubious about the terrible fate which threatens every country, and every nation, on being invaded by such terrible enemies." The armies continued their operations. Prince Charles made a sudden movement and attacked general Jourdan—a terrible conflict ensued for fourteen hours ; the field was disputed with such obstinate valor that the conflict ceased upon the field of action, through excessive fatigue ; the carnage was terrible, both parties withdrew. The next day general Moreau advanced and took possession of Nordlingen, and another severe action near Donawert compelled Prince Charles to retire and cross the Danube. General Jourdan advanced and took possession of Newark and Castel. The Austrians retired behind the river Nab.

Alarmed again for the fate of Germany, the emperor issued another proclamation, calling on the kingdom of Bohemia to enroll a militia for the safety of that kingdom. A junction now took place between prince Charles and general Wertensleben—the prince availed himself of this united force, attacked Jourdan, and drove him from his position on the Nab, with the loss of 7000 men ; this junction, and this action opened an advantage to general Moreau, which he improved by a splendid victory near the Lech, which opened a passage for the French arms into the heart of Bavaria ; Munich and Augsburg, were the trophies of these victories, August 23d and 24th. The elector of Bavaria sued for peace. A treaty of alliance offensive and defensive, was signed August 29, between France and Spain. Prince Charles continued to press Jourdan, and he retired behind the Mayne, and from thence to Hamelberg, with the loss of 4000 men. The peace concluded this campaign in Germany, with the small states near the Rhine, laid the foundation of that league which afterwards became the confederation of the Rhine.

This masterly stroke of Prince Charles, in uniting with Wertensleben to overpower Jourdan, rendered the advance of Moreau into the heart of Bavaria easy ; but when a succession of victories over Jourdan had weakened his force, and compelled him to retire, general Moreau was left exposed : he soon felt his critical situation, and attempted to extricate himself by a seasonable retreat ; in which he acquired more honor, than in his victorious advance.

The Austrians pressed the French close and severe ; and even the peasantry took up arms to revenge their sufferings. In the midst of this pursuit in Suabia, Moreau made a bold attack upon the advance guard of the Austrians, gained a decided advantage, killed, and took 5,000 men, with twenty pieces of cannon.

September 2—Generals Jourdan and Moreau, continued to retire before the overpowering force of prince Charles ; re-crossed the Rhine, and entered France, leaving a strong force in the fortress of Kehl.

This fortress was invested by prince Charles, with all the ardour of a conqueror, the garrison made a desperate resistance : prince Charles, anxious to detach a part of this victorious army to the relief of Mantua, which continued to be close invested by general Bonaparte, and impatient of every moment's delay, brought his whole force to bear upon Kehl ; and after a resistance of forty days, under the most desperate encounters, the prince carried Kehl by a general assault ; and drew off part of his army to the relief of Mantua. The same day, Mantua fell a conquest to the conqueror of Italy, about the 1st of February, 1797.

CHAP. XIV.

Submission of the Pope—triumphs of the campaign—treaty of Campo Formio—armament of Toulon—capture of Malta—battle of the Nile—conquest of Egypt—defeat at Acre—general Bonaparte returns to Egypt—to France—new coalition.

WITH the fall of Kehl and Mantua, the illustrious and splendid campaign of 1796, closed generally. On the 17th of November, died Catherine II. empress of Russia : and the great duke Paul, succeeded to the throne. After the fall of Mantua, all further resistance on the part of Austria, ceased in Italy ; and general Bonaparte advanced into the states of the pope under a fruitless resistance, and threatened Rome. His holiness addressed an affectionate letter to general Bonaparte, under the tender appellation of My dear son, and by his envoys sued for peace : to which the general replied, with the respectful appellation of Holy father, settled a peace, and retired into the Tyrol, to meet prince Charles ; a terrible action ensued—general Bonaparte was victorious, and prince Charles retreated with precipitation into the heart of Austria.

The emperor took the alarm, and sued for peace ; a truce of six days was granted by general Bonaparte ; a conference was opened, the preliminaries drawn, and the peace of Campo Formio, guaranteed to France all her conquests in Italy.

At this time a general sketch of the successes of the war, was published at Paris, stating, “ that from the 8th of February, 1793, to the 19th of February, 1797—France had gained 261 victories, including 31 pitched battles ; killed 152,000 of the enemy ; taken 197,784 prisoners, 288 strong places, 319 forts, camps, or redoubts, 7,965 pieces of cannon, 187,762 guns, 4,318,150 pounds of powder, 207 standards, 5,486 horses,” &c. &c. This treaty stipulated with the emperor of Germany for the release of the marquis La Fayette from the prison of Olmutz ; and the marquis, with his wife and daughter returned into France. Lord Malmsbury was sent, the 30th of June, by the English court to negotiate a peace at Lisle, and returned the 1st of September without effecting his purpose.

At this time, the republic of Genoa was united to France, under the name of the Ligurian republic. The young hero of Italy now returned in triumph to France, November 24, 1797, after having accomplished in one campaign what Lewis the XI. Charles VIII. Lewis XII. Francis I. Charles IX. Henry IV. Lewis XIV. and XV. kings of France, had each in his reign attempted to accomplish, at the expense of the best blood and treasures of France, but without success. This young hero was not only “ older when he came back,” but was illustrious in arms ; the trump of fame had proclaimed the successes of this ever memorable campaign to France, to Europe, and to the world. Alarmed at the triumphant popularity of the conqueror of Italy, upon his return into France, the directory began to tremble in their seats, and to provide for their safety ; this they soon found in their fleet in Toulon.

The directory assembled and equipped this fleet, with all possible expedition, consisting of 17 ships of the line, and 15,000 men, destined for a secret expedition upon foreign service, and gave the command to general Bonaparte. On the 9th of April, 1798, general Bonaparte left Paris, and repaired to Toulon to take the command of this armament ; and on the 19th set sail. This fleet was watched by an English fleet of an equal force, under the command of Lord Nelson, off the straits of Gibraltar, to intercept their passage to Ireland, should they attempt it, as was then contemplated.

Upon the first tidings of the sailing of the Toulon fleet, his lordship pursued up the Mediterranean, and at Malta learnt the fate of that Island, which the French had taken in their passage. He next sailed to the coast of Egypt, and reconnoitered the bay of Aboukir. Not finding the French fleet, he sailed to the coast of Syria. Not finding the French upon this coast, he returned to Egypt ; and to his great joy discovered the fleet in the bay of Aboukir, anchored close under the forts and batteries of the harbor, in the form of a crescent, at the distance of about one cable's length from each other, with the Le Orient, admiral Brueyes, in the centre.

During his lordship's passage to, and return from Syria, the French fleet had arrived, anchored in the bay, and landed the general with his army, &c. His lordship, on the afternoon of the 1st of August, upon his first arrival, gave signal for an immediate attack ; in the following order :—The fleet to advance in two divisions ; the first to pass within the French, between their fleet and the land ; the second division to pass without their fleet ; the two van ships to engage the Le Orient in the centre of the French line, the others to engage the ships of the French, lying between them. The signal was obeyed without any other accident, than the grounding of the Culloden, in the first attempt to pass between the French and the land : this ship served as a guide to the rest of the division, and had no share in the action.

In this position of the two fleets, the action commenced ; the conflict was terrible ; the French made a desperate resistance ; but before the half of their fleet which were not engaged, could slip their cables, and come into action, the Le Orient took fire, and blew up, with an explosion which shook the deep to its centre, and filled the dark vault of heaven with its blaze. The rest of the fleet engaged, were silenced and taken ; and the half which were not engaged, were all taken in the bay, except two—these were afterwards taken at sea. Thus fell at one fatal blow the vast armament of Toulon. Not so the general—he with his army were upon the heights of Alexandria, witnessing the destruction of his fleet, in the midst of a cannonade whose flashing thunders, like the bursting of Ætna, filled with awe the solemnity of the night scene, and diffused terror and distress through the horrors of the gloom.

General Bonaparte planted his eagles, without opposition, upon the walls of Alexandria; from thence, by easy marches he penetrated to Cairo, which, in its turn, fell an easy conquest. The resistance of the beys was feeble; the conqueror brought them into subjection by an artful policy, flattering some, encouraging others in their party quarrels, and subduing the obstinate by force. By these means, he soon placed himself at their head, as a conqueror, and at Grand Cairo he settled the government, and gave law to Egypt. General Bonaparte left a small force to protect his new government, and marched his army into Syria, to plant his eagles at Jerusalem, and give law to that country.

His march was rapid and unmolested, until he appeared before the commanding city of St. Jean de Acre, (a seaport of Syria;) it became absolutely necessary to conquer this place before he could accomplish his plan. He set down before the city, opened his trenches, and began the attack; upon the first appearance of a breach, he ordered an assault—the attempt was made, but the desperate resistance of the besieged, added to a galling fire from the small squadron of Sir Sidney Smith, (which raked the French from the bay as they advanced to the charge,) obliged the columns to retire; general Bonaparte ordered the charge to be renewed—the French advanced with great firmness and impetuosity, the conflict was terrible; the trenches before the city were filled with heaps of slain; the resistance was desperate; the French retired; and night closed the awful conflict. The next day, the general ordered the assault to be renewed; the issue became the same. Stung with chagrin at the repulse of his invincible legions, and fired with indignation at the obstinate resistance, he ordered the assault to be renewed: his army, exhausted with the fatigues and distresses of the conflict, and shocked with the horrid stench of their comrades, who lay in heaps in the trenches, (now become putrid by the heat of the climate,) and over whom they had to march to the assault, began to hesitate; and one regiment dared to disobey the order.

Struck with astonishment at the bold refusal, and fearing a general revolt, the hero of Italy, and conqueror of Egypt, abandoned his enterprise; beat a retreat, led back his army into Egypt, and returned to Cairo. Here he gave a grand fete in honor of the conquest of Syria, and inflicted a severe punishment upon the regiment which disobeyed at Acre, by causing them to march in review, with their arms reversed, and slung behind their backs. This severity of punishment, settled again the discipline of his army.

General Bonaparte settled the government of Egypt, and proceeded to Alexandria, where he ordered a frigate to be in readiness to attend him, wrote, and delivered a sealed letter to general Kleber, selected his favorite general Berthier, embarked on board the frigate, and set sail for France.

When the time had expired for general Kleber to open his letter, he found to his astonishment, that the general had abandoned his army, returned to France, and appointed him his successor in the army of Egypt. General Kleber shewed to the general officers his new commission, and assumed the command in general orders.

Gen. Bonaparte, after several hair-breadth escapes from the English cruizers, arrived in France; landed near the place where he had embarked the preceding year, and repaired directly to Paris. Here he was hailed as the deliverer of France.

During his absence, new scenes had been opened; new and distressing events had occurred. The arms of France had been weakened, her resources had declined, the confidence and energies of the nation had sunk, the government was enfeebled, and the constitution almost a cypher. France, in his absence, fitted out the Brest fleet, with troops, to assist the insurgents in Ireland; they were taken and destroyed by the English on their passage, and the expedition failed.

A new coalition was formed December 18, 1798, between England, Russia and Austria, to co-operate in the war against France. Old field mareschal Suwarrow was appointed to the command of the Russian and Austrian army, destined to the conquest of Italy. This army was to be paid by England and Austria.

CHAP. XV.

General Suwarrow enters Italy—battle of Switzerland—invasion of Holland—General Bonaparte first consul—battle of Marengo—infernal machine—northern armed neutrality—peace of Luneville—war between Spain and Portugal—battle of Copenhagen.

GENERAL Suwarrow entered Italy by the way of the Tyrol. The city of Mantua fell an easy conquest ; together with the other cities of Italy, taken by general Bonaparte, and the French generals McDonald, Angereau and others, retired before the conqueror. At this time the war raged generally ; general Jourdan crossed the Rhine and took Manheim, March 2, 1799. General Bonaparte was then in Syria. General Massena was stationed in Switzerland, where he was watched by prince Charles upon the Rhine, and another Austrian army which lay towards Vienna. Suwarrow in his march, took possession of all the cities and strong holds in Italy, in the name of the emperor of Russia : this excited jealousy and distrust in the coalition. England checked her supplies, Austria grew cold ; prince Charles neglected the necessary arrangements, to form a necessary co-operation.

As Suwarrow approached Switzerland, to attack Massena, the French general anticipated his movements, commenced a desperate attack upon the Austrian army which watched him on the side of Vienna, routed and destroyed it, before Suwarrow could pass the mountains and afford assistance. He then by a sudden movement fell upon Suwarrow with his victorious troops ; the conflict was short, but terrible ; Suwarrow was beaten, obliged to take advantage of the mountains, file off into Germany, and secure his retreat. Here he proposed to form a junction with prince Charles, who refused.

This old hero of the north, this champion over the Turks, this conqueror of Warsaw and of Italy, was recalled by his master, banished the court, and died in disgrace. Massena held his strong position in Switzerland. The Austrian army in Italy advanced and laid siege to Genoa ; the English in co-operation with Russia made a descent upon Holland, and took and carried off the Dutch fleet, September 1 ; at the same time they landed a strong force under the command of the duke of York, and attempted the conquest of Holland. This opened a new scene—the Dutch and French united their forces, and, by a succession of victories, the duke of York, with his English and Russian army, were compelled to sign a convention, and resign up the Dutch fleet (which they had carried off a few months before) as a pledge for the safe embarkation of their army. This convention was the second volume of the old convention of Closter-seven in Hanover, in the old seven years war.

In the midst of these events, general Bonaparte arrived at Paris ; by the efforts of his friends put himself at the head of a small military force, appeared at the hall of the national council, entered with his sword drawn, and at the point of the bayonet dissolved their sitting and power, locked up the hall, took the key, and retired. Sieyes and others of the directory were in the secret—they immediately framed a new constitution, after the form of the old Roman consular government, with three consuls, a senate, &c. and general Bonaparte was elected first consul for ten years, December 13, 1799. During the operations in Holland, the English seized on the city of Rome, and the Roman States in Italy. The consul addressed a letter to the king of England on the subject of peace, and at the same time assembled an army of reserve at Dijon ; organized the government, put himself at the head of the army of Dijon, crossed the Alps, and appeared on the plains of Italy, before the Austrian general (who was pressing the siege of Genoa) had knowledge of his movements. Placed between two fires, he raised the siege and retired to meet the consul, who awaited him on the plains of Marengo : here the conflict which was to decide the fate of Italy commenced in the morning ; the Austrians advanced on to the plain, the consul retired and took his position in a strong defile, in a pass of the mountains : the conflict was desperate, the consul resisted the impetuosity of the Austrian attacks, until a column of fresh troops, (posted by design fifteen miles distant) were conveyed in waggons to the scene of action ; this column, with their brave general Dessaix at their head, entered the pass, and rushed like a torrent upon the plain, overwhelming all opposition ; the conflict was short, the carnage terrible, and the gallant Dessaix crowned with his death the victory of Marengo. This action was of itself a campaign ; the army of Austria was destroyed, her power in Italy subdued, and all Italy recovered to France. The consul, by a rapid movement, entered Milan without opposition and enjoyed the triumph. June 4th.—He dispersed the remnant of the Austrians at Montebello, and settled an armistice for Italy, June 10th, and established the Cisalpine Republic. The movements on the Rhine, had been stayed during these important movements of the consul.

On the 18th of July, Gen. Moreau gained an important victory over the Austrians at Blenheim, and again at Newburg on the 28th ; these successes were followed by preliminaries of peace, which were signed at Paris, July 28, 1800.

Paul, emperor of Russia, made the first motion for a convention, for an armed neutrality which was acceded to by all the northern powers, Dec. 24.

At this time an attempt was made upon the life of the 1st Consul by the infernal machine (so called) as he rode to the theatre ; this machine was about the size of a barrel, filled with gunpowder, spikes, bullets, &c. with a machinery to strike fire for an explosion, like the torpedo, which could be regulated for any particular time. This machine was placed in the way of the Consul where his carriage would pass that evening to the opera, and the explosion took effect, directly after the Consul had passed ; the shock and alarm were great, some of the materials were thrown over the-tops of houses, but no essential damage was done. The Consul passed on to the opera, without regarding the event, staid the usual time, and retired.

Notwithstanding the preliminaries of peace were signed between France and Austria, the French pushed their advances in Italy and Germany ; they seized on Tuscany, and met with a check in Italy which occasioned the armistice of Treviso. They penetrated on the Danube near to Vienna, which caused the convention of Luneville between Austria and France, Jan. 28, 1801. The definitive treaty was signed Feb. 23.

On the 1st of January, 1801, the English assembled a fleet at St. Marmorice, for the purpose of conquering Egypt—the command of this armament was given to Lord Keith, and he set sail on the 27th of February ; all Egypt was subdued in one campaign ; the French army taken by capitulation, and sent back to France, and Egypt was restored to the Turks, May, 1803. At this time Spain proclaimed war against Portugal, which was settled in one month by the treaty of Badajoz. A new convention was now effected between England and Russia, and the preliminaries of a general peace were signed at London, Oct. 1, 1801. The storm of war was now hushed throughout the world, for the first time since the year 1793.

The northern confederacy in 1800, which supported their armed neutrality, gave a general alarm in England ; they remembered the depredations which formerly ravaged their island, from the mouth of the Baltic, and they were jealous of this confederacy, and resolved to suppress it. The English laid an embargo upon all the ships and vessels of Russia, Denmark and Sweden ; and dispatched a fleet, under the command of lord Nelson, to attack the Danish fleet in the harbor of Copenhagen, Aug. 1801. The Danes collected their whole fleet, to the number of twenty-eight sail of the line, under cover of their forts and batteries ; they also constructed a number of floating batteries for the occasion, and put their harbor in the best possible state of defence. Lord Nelson entered the Baltic sound, and with great labor, warped his fleet through the passage, where a fleet had never passed before, and by this means, entered the harbour of Copenhagen with a fair wind. The Danes were prepared, and the action commenced : here the thunders of Aboukir were renewed ; the attack was fierce and terrible—the resistance firm, desperate and bloody. The carnage on board the batteries was so great, that they were repeatedly manned from the shores, with fresh troops. The cannonade from the fleets, the batteries, the forts and the shores, was awfully sublime ; their thunders shook the land, the ocean and the heavens : the fleets swam in blood : the Danes were subdued ; and awful was the scene of silence, solemnity and gloom that ensued. His lordship landed in person, attended the king, settled a peace, and conducted the shattered remains of the Danish fleet in triumph to England. This peace severed the northern confederacy, and brought Russia into an alliance against France.

Revolution in St. Domingo—character of the Black Chiefs—conquest of Hanover—first Consul chosen for life—made emperor of France—Austrian war—fall of Vienna—battle of Austerlitz—peace with Austria—war between England and Spain.

A general joy was diffused throughout Europe and America. This however was of short continuance—the rage of liberty and equality in France, early in the revolution, had abolished slavery in all the French West-India Islands ; a violent revolution of liberty and equality commenced immediately at St. Domingo, which raged with all the horrors of rapine, murders, massarces and confiscation ; the beautiful town of Cape Francois was in ruins, and the blacks in arms ; the whites and people of colour were the victims of their rage. The consul embraced this calm to check this violence in the colonies—he had lost the confidence of the army of Egypt, by deserting them, and he could place no confidence in an army who in his absence had murdered their general, (Kleber ;) he appointed Gen. Le Clerc to the command, and sent out this army of Egypt to subdue the rebel blacks in St. Domingo. The blacks made a desperate resistance—the horrors of St. Domingo exceeded the horrors of Egypt and Syria, and the swords of the blacks, together with the fatal West-India climate, ruined and destroyed the whole of this army ; the blacks maintained their liberty, and established the kingdom of Hayti, 1802. In the Island of St. Domingo, African slavery first commenced, and here they first obtained their liberty, and established an independent government.

During this revolution in St. Domingo, appeared Tousant, Christophe, and other Chiefs, who possessed strong minds, great dignity, firmness, and strength of character, with a general knowledge of men and things, joined to a correct knowledge of the military art. They made a figure at the head of their armies, which commanded obedience and respect ; their troops were regularly formed and disciplined, their cause was the cause of liberty, and they defended it with desperate valour, and rose superior to French tactics, discipline and intrigue. When they had organized and established their government, there appeared at the head of it, and of the several departments, a description of characters, fully competent to the duties of their stations, and the government was, and continues to be administered, with energy, wisdom, firmness and dignity ; commerce and the plantations flourish, and the government, and the laws are respected in the kingdom of Hayti.

The peace of Europe remained undisturbed until June 7, 1803. At this time, England, alarmed at the growing power of the French, declared war. The consul had been constituted consul for ten years more, after the first term of ten years should expire, and afterwards had been elected consul for life, by a subscripive vote of more than three million of citizens ; and his military preparations had excited a general alarm in Europe, particularly in England, on account of the hostile movements upon the French coast. The English had evacuated Egypt, the 16th of May, and called home their fleet and troops, for the defence of their island. The consul announced to the nation, that England had declared war; and made great preparations upon the coast, for the invasion of England; sent a strong military force into the west of Germany, and seized on Hanover, the hereditary dominions of George III. king of England, June, 1803. The spirit of the French nation was high, at this time: the invasion of England with delenda est (Carthago, Carthage must be destroyed,) became the order of the day; boats, galleys and small craft, were built and collected from all the ports of France and Holland, and assembled at Boulogne; soldiers were trained daily, in the order of embarking and disembarking; a general alarm prevailed in England, and the consul reigned in the hearts of the French people. The licentiousness of liberty had been checked in some degree by a decree of the directory, prohibiting the circulation of foreign newspapers in France, in 1797. This check had been improved by the first consul, in suppressing the licentiousness of the presses, and confining the publications to licensed papers only. This led to an anecdote, which may serve to mark the difference of characters, and difference of the times, in France. When the marquis La Fayette (who had been released by Gen. Bonaparte, at the peace of Campo Formio, from the dungeon of Olmutz,) was called upon to give his subscribeive vote to the first consul, as consul for life, he addressed this note to the consul:—"The marquis La Fayette presents his compliments to Gen. Bonaparte, and will most cheerfully give him his vote as first consul for life, provided he will restore freedom of speech, and freedom of the press to the French people." The consul returned this reply:—"Gen. Bonaparte returns his compliments to the marquis La Fayette, and assures him, that should he comply with his wishes, neither the marquis La Fayette, nor general Bonaparte, would be in France in six months." This difference of character caused the difference in the affairs of France, and gave her at this time, the power of distressing her ancient rival.

The consul signified to the marquis La Fayette, that he might retire upon one of his estates, remote from Paris: the marquis withdrew. Jealousy, distrust and apprehension prevailed throughout England; parties ran high in the cabinet; the government and the nation were alive to their common safety ; and the military kept the peace. Austria alarmed for the safety of Europe, joined a new confederacy against France, to give a check to the movements against England. She assembled a powerful force in Suabia, upon the Danube, under general Mac, who took up his head-quarters at the strong and commanding position of Ulm.

The English were successful in the East and West Indies, and took the island of Demerara. The consul caused generals Pichegru and Moreau to be arrested in Paris : Pichegru died in his prison, and Moreau was banished, and fled to America, where he remained until 1813.

This year the emperor of Russia, Alexander, (who had succeeded to the throne upon the death of his father Paul) made great movements to co-operate with England and Austria against France. A new revolution took place in the French government, and an imperial government was established May 5 ; the consul was vested with the imperial dignity, and crowned by the pope at Paris, at the almost unanimous voice of the nation August 11, 1804. The emperor continued his operations upon the coast, and the invasion of England became every day more popular in France, and more alarming in England, which increased the preparations for defence and security. During these operations, the emperor put himself at the head of the army of England (so called,) and by a sudden movement passed the bridge of Strasburg, and appeared in Suabia, before Ulm, October, 1805. The same rapid movements which brought him before this city, obliged general Mac to abandon it, almost without resistance, and led the French soldiers to say—" Our emperor makes us use our legs, if we do not use our muskets." Gen. Mac retired down the Danube ; the emperor pursued by forced marches, penetrated to Vienna, took it November 14, left a garrison, and filed off with his army into Moravia to meet the emperor Alexander, with his Russian army. The two young emperors lay in sight of each other several days, when the emperor Napoleon made a sudden retrograde movement : this deceived the emperor Alexander, who suspected his enemy was about to make his escape.

The emperor Napoleon retired several miles, and made a halt upon an eminence at Austerlitz, to observe the motions of his enemy. The emperor Alexander put his army in motion to pursue ; and in order to intercept his retreat, he detached a division of his army, with orders to gain the rear of the emperor Napoleon : such a movement on the part of the king of Prussia, towards old mareschal Daun in Silesia, proved fatal to the enterprize. Napoleon saw the result—he had caught Alexander in the trap he had set for him, and exclaimed, “ They will all be given into my hands before night.” He ordered a charge to be made upon the detached division : the onset was violent ; they were overthrown with great slaughter ; put to the sword, or driven at the point of the bayonet into a neighbouring lake, where they almost all perished. A general charge was then made on the main body of the Russian army ; the conflict was short, the carnage was great, and the victory decisive, Dec. 2, 1805. The emperors drew off their armies, settled a peace, and the Emperor Alexander returned with his shattered army into Russia. The emperor Napoleon returned to Vienna, settled a peace with the emperor, which stripped him of the title of Emperor of Germany, and of his dominions in the Tyrol, (these were added to Italy) and left him only the title of Emperor of Austria.— This blow severed the union of the Germanic body, and left them without a head. The emperor Napoleon then led back his victorious army in triumph into France, again posted them on the seaboard, and retired to his palace.

The invasion of England was again renewed ; the successes of the last year, had kindled anew the zeal and ardor of the nation, and the disasters of the allies, had as greatly depressed the English nation ; all was anxiety and alarm.

Thus Napoleon, under the imperial crown, in one campaign, triumphed over the grand coalition, in the capital of Austria ; triumphed over the emperor of Russia in the famous battle and peace of Austerlitz ; triumphed over the Germanic body, by deposing their head ; and over the house of Austria, by annexing the country of the Tyrol, to the conquests of France in Italy ; and made his enemies support the war. The easy access of Ulm, was the first fruits of the confederation of the Rhine, which commenced as early as August 1796. The object of this confederation was to withdraw the small states near the Rhine from the contest between the great rival powers, and prevent their becoming the perpetual theatre of war.

The emperor Napoleon, by his powerful forces upon the coast, overawed the republic of Holland ; changed their constitution, placed at their head a tool of his own, under the title of grand pensionary ; and thus assumed the dominion of Holland, 1805. England at this time issued letters of marque and reprisal against Spain, to prosecute the war which had been declared the 14th of December, 1804.

CHAP. XVII.

Emperor Napoleon on the throne of Charlemagne—battle of Trafalgar—confederation of the Rhine—Prussian war—battle of Jena; of Eylau; of Friedland—peace of Tilsit—Berlin decree—treaty of Fontainbleau—Bayonne Decree—fall of Charles IV. and Ferdinand VII.—capture of Madrid.

On the 1st of May, 1805, the emperor Napoleon was crowned king of Italy. Again the Franks were gratified to see a successor of Charlemagne upon the throne of France, and the iron crown of the Romans placed upon the head of an emperor of the west. The spirit of the nation was high, but the conscripts began to be sent to the armies, chained in pairs, and the conscription galled; internal gloom and murmur began to dampen the spirit of patriotism, and the voice of applause. The senate of Genoa decreed the union of the Ligurian Republic with France. The English made a daring attempt to burn the flotilla in the harbor of Boulogne with carcasses; but failed, August 31, and the general preparations for invasion went forward.

During these great preparations for the invasion of England, the combined fleets of France and Spain, lay secure in the harbor of Cadiz; but the blockade of the English under Lord Nelson was so close, as to cut off all supplies by water; the supplies from the country failed, and they were obliged to change their position. To effect this, they put to sea in order to gain the port of Toulon. Lord Nelson pursued, and the fleets were soon in sight of each other off the cape of Trafalgar. The combined fleet, to the number of twenty or thirty sail, moved in form of a crescent, under an easy sail, before the wind. When Lord Nelson came up, he ordered his fleet to bear down upon the enemy in two divisions, break through the line, and commence the attack. The signal was obeyed, and the action commenced.

The thunders of the Nile, and of Copenhagen were renewed; the conflict became general; the battle was desperate, and the carnage terrible. The English were victorious; the allies lost the greater part of their fleet, taken, sunk, or destroyed, and the remnant made their escape to Toulon.

Thus failed the threat of the emperor Napoleon. "I will eat my Christmas dinner in London." Nelson the great; the hero of Aboukir; of Copenhagen; of Trafalgar, &c.; the champion of the ocean; the pride, the boast, and the ornament of his country, and his country's arms, crowned with his death the victory of Trafalgar. Oct. 21, 1805.

The emperor Napoleon had ventured to say, that he should keep his Christmas in London; this was fixing a day; this rendered certain, what had before been only conjecture, that he was in earnest, and that he intended to lead the enterprise in person: the whole political horizon was at this time dark and gloomy. In America, there was a total eclipse of the sun at mid-day (a sublime display of the majesty of the heavenly bodies,) June 16, 1806.

A resolution originated in the House of Lords, and passed the national council, for the abolition of slavery. A treaty was signed at Paris between France and the States of Bavaria, Wirtemberg, Baden, and several smaller German states, such as Lower Saxony and Hesse Cassel, by which these states renounced their connection with the German empire, and under the name of the confederation of the Rhine, placed themselves under the protection of France. This closed the compact of the confederation of the Rhine, which had been so long in agitation. This confederation opened to France a free access into the heart of Germany, and brought the two great powers of Austria and Prussia, upon their frontier; destroyed at one blow all that chain of barrier towns which had called forth the genius of a Vauban in the reign of Lewis XIV. and been the object of all succeeding treaties, for the safety both of France and Germany.

This treaty opened to France an easy passage to the capitals of all the States of Germany: and the rival spirit between Prussia and Austria, which Lewis XIV. had sown, and Lewis XV. had cherished, now gave the emperor Napoleon an opportunity to improve it. England and Russia, alarmed at the gigantic strides of France, formed a new coalition with Prussia, to protect the king against the encroachments of the emperor of France, and to strengthen the defence of England. The emperor Napoleon was now prepared for the campaign, to defeat this coalition. He had reaped the first fruits of the conquest over the divided rival states of Austria and Prussia, by humbling the house of Austria, whilst the king of Prussia remained an inactive spectator ; he was now prepared to strip the ancient laurels from the brows of the other rival, and shew to the king of Prussia the truth of this sacred maxim, " that a house divided against itself must fall."

The emperor Napoleon knew, and the king of Prussia, ought to have known that a union of Prussia with Austria, would have prevented the defeat of general Mac at Ulm : if not, it would have prevented the fall of Vienna, and given the emperor of Russia time to unite his forces ; this would have produced the same effects, as resulted from the same union of Leipsic, 1813. This was now too late, the die was cast, Austria was humbled, and Prussia stood alone. France held Hanover by conquest in 1803. The emperor Napoleon had concluded a treaty at Paris with the Russian minister. This treaty the emperor Alexander refused to ratify : he prepared to co-operate against France, and published his manifesto.

The French pressed upon the borders of Prussia, and occasioned a collision and rencounter. Prince Lewis of Prussia was killed, and war commenced ; both parties were prepared for action, both sovereigns took the field : and the emperor of Russia put his army in motion to co-operate.

The emperor Napoleon advanced into Germany at the head of the victorious army of the Danube ; the two armies met at Jena, (a strong town in Lower Saxony,) the conflict was terrible, the victory decisive ; the Prussians fled—the French pursued into the heart of Prussia, the king reinforced as he retired until winter checked the operations of the campaign, and the emperor took up his winter quarters in Prussia, and watched the king. The Prussians hoped to take advantage of their climate, and engage the French, by surprise, in their quarters. Accordingly, the king at dead of night, in the severity of winter, attacked the emperor Napoleon by surprise, in his camp at Eylau. A terrible conflict and carnage ensued, the veterans of the Danube, of Austerlitz, and of Jena, were firm and unshaken, the attack was well concerted, well executed, and as well resisted ; both parties claimed the victory, and took up their quarters.

With the opening of the spring, the emperor Napoleon commenced his operations. Dantzic and Conigsburgh were the trophies of his victories. The Prussians retired behind the Pregel, where they met the Russians ; Napoleon advanced ; the two armies met at Friedland. Here the fate of Prussia was sealed, by an action as great, as important, and as decisive as either of the two armies had experienced ; the victory was complete. The allies sued for peace, and the emperor Napoleon dictated the peace of Tilsit, which guaranteed the friendship of Alexander, and secured his safe return into Russia. It opened all Prussia to the arms of Napoleon, stripped the king of all but the name of king, with a scanty pittance to support it, and guaranteed the peace of Germany, June 26, 1807. This treaty secured to the emperor Napoleon, the whole sea-coast from Riga, on the confines of Russia, to Bayonne, on the confines of Spain.

Napoleon repaired to Berlin, and passed his Berlin decree, interdicting all commerce with England ; and had high expectations, that this decree would banish all English commerce from the continent. This was one of those decrees which called forth the noted orders in council in England, which together, distressed neutral commerce, excited general complaint in America, and caused the war with England in 1812. A general blockade by the British ships of war and armed vessels took place on the coast of Europe, and in the Baltic ; also a proclamation calling in all their seamen abroad, in whatever service. This brought on collisions between British armed vessels and neutrals, and involved the question of the right of search. The president of the United States issued his proclamation, forbidding all intercourse with British ships of war ; this expelled the English naval force from the American ports. These orders of council, led the emperor of Russia to declare war against England, July 27, 1807. The expedition into Prussia, being thus closed, the liberties of Germany sealed by the treaty of Tilsit, and Russia engaged in a war with England ; all further coalition in a war with France was closed. Napoleon was now at liberty to turn his attention to the peninsula. He led back his troops in triumph again into France, stationed them upon the sea-board, and repaired again to his palace.

Parties ran high this year in America ; the English, as well as the French, had envied her prosperous commerce : and having realized that America was enriched by the quarrels of Europe, they had both struck her a severe blow, by their decrees, and orders in council. This blow brought America into the continental system, in December, 1807. A national embargo commenced, which lasted seven years, and finally resulted in a war with England, which terminated at the peace of 1815.

A new field of operations opened to employ the energies of Napoleon, he now aspired to the universal sovereignty of Europe, if not of the world, and found it necessary to hold the dominion of Spain, in order to accomplish his plans.

He remembered, that Portugal originally was a part of Spain, and that on the sequestration of Alphonso Henriquez, 1139, it had been united into a kingdom; that Spain had again recovered it in 1580; and again it was sequestered by the duke of Braganza, 1640; he knew that it would be an object with Spain again to recover Portugal, and accordingly negotiated a treaty at Fontainbleau, to co-operate with Spain in the conquest, and partition of Portugal: with some assurances to aid in the recovery of Gibraltar. Charles IV. was upon the throne of Spain, a very old man, and his son, Ferdinand VII. ready in waiting to succeed him. Napoleon moved a large army to Bayonne, (near the confines of Spain) passed his Bayonne decree, to strengthen his Berlin decree against English commerce. He next prepared to execute his plan; commenced an intrigue with Charles IV. and induced him to resign his crown to his son Ferdinand; he next intrigued with Ferdinand, and drew him into his camp at Bayonne, where he detained him a prisoner; he then sent general Murat, grand duke of Berg, at the head of a strong military force into Spain, to take possession of Madrid.

CHAP. XVIII.

Spanish Junta declare war; Joseph Bonaparte king of Spain—fall of Dupont—conquest of Rome—kingdom of Holland—conference of Erfurth—battle of Corunna—Austrian war—battle of Ratisbon—fall of Vienna—battle of Lobeau—of Wagram—peace with Austria—invasion of Holland, by the English.

CHARLES IV. revoked his resignation, appointed general Murat, lieutenant general of Spain, and repaired to Bayonne, where he and his son, both made a formal surrendry of the crown of Spain, to Napoleon; who conferred it upon his brother Joseph Bonaparte, and detained Charles IV. and Ferdinand VII. as prisoners in France. Stung with chagrin and indignation, at this outrage upon the sovereignty of Spain, the Spaniards butchered about 5,000 of the French, under Murat at Madrid, and the French about as many Spaniards in their turn. The Junta of Spain caught the alarm, assembled an army, declared war against France, retired into the south as far as Seville, and were supported by the English at Cadiz. The emperor Napoleon having thus secured the crown of Spain, prepared to support the title of his brother. He framed a new constitution for Spain, at Bayonne, passed the Pyrenees, and entered Spain, at the head of the victorious army of Germany; marched to Madrid, placed his brother Joseph on the throne, caused him to be crowned, and sent one army to co-operate with the Spanish army in the conquest of Portugal, and another to the south, to invest the Junta in Seville. Both plans succeeded; the French and Spaniards entered Portugal, and penetrated to Lisbon. The royal family retired to Brazil, in South America. General Soult pushed the conquest of the south of Spain, and invested Cadiz. The English sent a fleet to protect Cadiz. The English sent a strong force to Lisbon, drove out the French, and prepared to co-operate with the Portuguese, in recovering their country: they trained the Portuguese soldiers to arms and discipline, and taught them how to beat the French.

At this time, general Dupont, with an army of 14,000 men, surrendered to the Spanish patriots, July 31, 1808. This blow shook the throne of king Joseph; he considered all as lost; and suffered the churches in Madrid to be rifled, together with other excesses and irregularities—collected his troops, and evacuated Madrid, August 21, 1808. The French, at the same time, entered Rome, in Italy, decreed the papal throne vacant, and deprived the Pope of his ecclesiastical states, to compel him to enforce the continental system. The emperor Napoleon subverted the republic of Holland, erected it into a kingdom, and placed his brother Louis upon the throne.

At this time, sir Arthur Wellesley began to act in Portugal, and gained the action at Vimeria, which proved fatal to the French arms in Portugal, and compelled them to sue for an armistice, which was granted; they evacuated Portugal by a convention, October 1, 1808. In this state of things, the emperor Napoleon proposed an interview with the emperor Alexander, at Erfurth, (a strong town in Thuringia, in Lower Saxony, in Germany,) then under the dominion of the French. This interview took place October 12, lasted several days, attended with much etiquette; and closed, with mutual assurances of friendship and good humor.

The result of this conference was, a mutual overture to England, for peace: this was rejected; and the English sent a strong armament to the north of Spain, under generals Moore and Baird, and assembled their force at Salamanca. Alarmed at this movement, the emperor repaired to Madrid with a strong force, restored king Joseph to the throne, and took the field in person. At the approach of the emperor, the British army retired towards the coast; the French pressed close upon their rear; some sharp encounters ensued, but nothing decisive, until they reached Corunna, the port of embarkation. Here, sir John Moore was compelled to sustain a general action, to cover the embarkation: the French were victorious; the English suffered very severely, and sir J. Moore fell in the action. Thus Spain, on the north, was cleared at a blow. Napoleon returned to Paris, and left king Joseph in quiet possession of his crown.

Great Britain, alarmed at the conference at Erfurth, entered into a negotiation, and settled a peace with the Turks, in order to find employment for the Emperor Alexander.

Napoleon addressed a letter to the Emperor Alexander, in which he styled him Emperor of the East, and received, in reply, the title of Emperor of the West—and hostilities commenced immediately, between Russia and the Turks.

At this time, Mr. Madison succeeded Mr. Jefferson, in the presidency in America; Mr. Erskine concluded with the American government a treaty of accommodation to regulate the commercial differences between England and America, and commerce was restored by the president's proclamation. This negotiation was disavowed by the British government, and things remained as they were.

The rupture contemplated between France and Austria now became inevitable—Austria had renewed her strength during the conflicts in Spain; assembled another army at Ulm, and prince Charles was now invested with the supreme command; he published his manifesto and took the field, March 14.

Fired with indignation at this new coalition, the Emperor Napoleon, (now on the coast superintending the preparations for invasion,) repaired to Paris, made a demand on the bank for an immense sum, guaranteed the safety of the bank against all runs that should affect its credit, and protected it by a military force ; returned to his army, put himself at their head, crossed the bridge at Strasburg, and appeared in Suabia. The victories of Puffenhoffen, Tam, Abensburg, Landshut, and Eckmul, on the 20th, 21st, 22d and 23d of April, announced the approach of the conqueror. He advanced without further opposition, and met prince Charles at Ratisbon ; here a terrible conflict ensued ; the prince was routed, and retired in disorder upon the left bank of the Danube : the emperor Napoleon passed through Ratisbon on the 29th, took the right bank, and by forced marches appeared before Vienna, before prince Charles arrived ; took the city, and rested his army on the 21st and 22d of May. The prince passed on the opposite bank a few miles below the city, and fortified a strong camp, upon the heights of Aspern and Esling, opposite to the island of Lobeau : the centre of his camp was supported by an immense park of artillery, in the form of a crescent ; here he awaited the French.

When the emperor Napoleon had rested, and refreshed his army at Vienna, he moved down to Lobeau, caused a bridge of boats to be thrown across on to the island, and from thence to the opposite bank ; and put his army in motion to cross : when about one half of the army had gained the opposite bank, the prince caused a large quantity of logs (which he had prepared for the purpose,) to be let loose ; these destroyed the emperor's bridge, upon the opposite bank, and at the same time, Charles commenced an attack.

The emperor saw himself out-generaled : his situation was critical, and his measures were desperate. He ordered the bridge to be repaired, and at the same time commenced an attack upon the Austrian camp—but without success : he renewed the attack—but without success : he then ordered mareschal Lannes, at the head of the French cavalry, to charge the centre of the Austrian camp, and carry the whole crescent of artillery : this desperate assault was executed with all the intrepidity and valor of mareschal Lannes—but without success ; he crowned this assault with his death.

This desperate attack astonished the prince, and gave a check to his efforts ; and Napoleon (having repaired his bridge) drew off his army, repassed the Danube, and returned to Vienna ; here he rested and recruited his army a whole month. The tribute of respect the emperor paid to the memory of mareschal Lannes was, to cause his body to be conveyed to France in a coach of state, covered with a black pall, attended by a military escort.

After the action of Lobeau, prince Charles moved down the river, and fortified a strong camp on the plains of Wagram, and awaited the emperor. When the emperor Napoleon had fully reconnoitered the position of the prince, he put his army in motion, crossed the river again at Lobeau, and under cover of a dark, rainy, dismal night, led his army through by-roads considered as impassable for an army, and in the morning appeared on the plains of Wagram, in the rear of the prince. The prince in his turn was compelled to fight in a position un contemplated ; his fortified camp was now rendered useless ; the conflict was short, but terrible—and fatal to the prince : his army was cut to pieces, routed and destroyed, and a remnant fled into Hungary. The emperor advanced as far as Presburg, halted his army a few days, returned to Vienna, settled a peace with the emperor of Austria, dismembered again the southern section of Austria, by a line running from Switzerland to Hungary, and annexed it to Italy : this included the country of the Grissons—November 8, 1809.

During these operations, the duke of Sudermania was elected king of Sweden, under the title of Charles XIII. May 14 ; and on the 9th of August the English invaded the coast of Holland with an army of 40,000 men, and took the island of Walcheren ; but were soon obliged to abandon it, to save their army from the pestilence of the climate.

CHAP. XIX.

The imperial continental system—divorce of the empress Josephine, and marriage of Maria Louisa of Austria—war in Spain---war in Turkey---war in Portugal---birth of the imperial heir of France---preparations for the Russian war---America.

THE emperor returned to France ; again formed the line of invasion upon the sea-coast, pushed the war in Spain, and pressed the continental system, in France, Spain, Italy, Holland, Austria, Germany, Prussia, Denmark, Sweden and Norway ; also in Hamburg, and the cities of the Hanseatic league.

This system at this time embraced all Europe, except Turkey and Russia. The emperor of the French now beheld himself upon the throne of Charlemagne, with an extent of dominion greater, and a population far more numerous, enriched with all the treasures of commerce, and adorned with all the refinements of the sciences, and the elegance and splendor of the arts. A throne unrivalled in the annals of time. The war in Spain was only considered as a field day exercise, to keep the troops in motion, and amuse the French people.

The ambition of this mighty conqueror was not yet satisfied. In his early career of glory under the consulate, he had married the favorite of the director Barras, who filled the throne, as empress, with dignity; but remained without issue. To remedy this evil, and to strengthen his crown, Napoleon divorced his wife Josephine, and offered his hand to the archduchess Maria Louisa, of Austria. This overture was accepted, and general Berthier, prince of Neufchatel, was despatched to Vienna to celebrate the nuptials, and escort the empress into France: where again they were celebrated, with all the pomp and splendor, becoming the emperor of France. The emperor passed but a short time at Paris: he assembled a large force at Bayonne; pushed the war in Spain, strengthened the line of invasion of England; and passed the season of 1810 in visiting his dominions, particularly the sea-coast, accompanied by the empress. The war raged this year in Spain with various success; but nothing decisive. The emperor of Russia prosecuted the war against the Turks with vigor, and acquired some very considerable advantages in the provinces of Moldavia and Wallachia. The emperor Napoleon, viewed with a jealous eye, these movements of the emperor Alexander, and determined to check him. He again pressed him to enforce the continental system in Russia; not succeeding in this, he entered into secret treaties with the courts of Austria and Prussia, to furnish such a quota of men, &c. to compel the emperor Alexander to adopt the continental system: all under the mask of coercing England to peace.

The plans being settled, he began to push the war in Spain and Portugal, with vigor; sent general Massena into Portugal at the head of 70,000 men, and invested the English and Portuguese in Lisbon. The English fleet protected the city, and the French made no assault.

General Massena drew off his army from before Lisbon, and retired up the Tagus with a view to cross that river, and carry on his operations against Lisbon upon the left bank; ravage the south country of Portugal, and bombard Lisbon from the heights opposite the city. Lord Wellington pressed him so close with the British and Portuguese army, as to defeat this movement; he gained some important advantages in the mountains, in the battle of Busaco, over general Massena, November 15, 1810. The emperor reinforced this army, and general Massena advanced again; drove lord Wellington into Lisbon, and invested the city. The Spanish patriots were assembled in arms throughout the interior, and harassed the French with frequent and sharp skirmishes, and the spirit of opposition increased daily in Spain.

The emperor, at this time, saw himself at the head of 800,000 men in arms; 450,000 of this force were in the interior of France, and on the sea-board; and the pressure on England increased daily. Expectations of ruining the English system of finance, were very high in France; but Russia still held out.

At this time the credit of the English funds stood high; their flag waved in every clime, and every sea. By a fortuitous concurrence of events, the whole trade of South America had been opened to England: this supplied her West India colonies, as well as augmented her revenue. Loans to immense amount were filled as soon as opened; they strengthened their position at Lisbon; augmented their army; and laid the foundation for the successes of 1812.

At this time, the empress presented the emperor with an heir to the throne, April 20, 1811; who was named Napoleon Francis Charles Joseph. Parties at this time ran high in America, and the government looked for a war with England.

The emperor had now completed his plans, and began to put his machines in motion: he organized his system of finance, to meet the importance of the movements: he intrigued with the Poles, and promised to restore the unity and sovereignty of Poland: drew his best troops from Spain, and replaced them by detachments from the north of Germany, and the banks of the Vistula; and pressed the king of Denmark into a compliance with his measures. He dissolved the kingdom of Holland, annexed it to France, incorporated it with the empire, and brought king Louis to Paris.

At this time, general Massena again fell back from before Lisbon, for want of supplies for his army. Lord Wellington again pressed close upon the French, and gained some advantages. The war raged sharp in Spain, between lord Wellington and general Massena, and became a war of posts. The French invested Cadiz, and attempted to reduce it by storm; but the English protected the city, and set them at defiance. General Soult assembled and concentrated his forces, and by severe and repeated actions, protected Badajoz. General Massena in the same manner covered Ciudad Roderigo. These movements and operations, called forth the talents and energies of some of the greatest captains; and the desperate conflicts which frequently took place, together with the harassing parties of the Spanish patriots, rendered Spain one theatre of carnage and distress. These scenes continued to waste and distress that devoted country, under various successes, through the years 1811 and 12, during the grand operations of the Russian war; until the overthrow of the emperor Napoleon in the north, gave to his enemies the superiority in the south, and secured to lord Wellington a triumph, which broke the power of Napoleon in Spain, and drove the French from the Peninsula.

During the operations of 1811 in Spain, the whole christian world was one theatre of intrigue. The emperor of Russia waged successful war with the Turks; but at the same time made overtures for peace. England favored these overtures, with a view to unite Russia, Austria, and the Turk, in one grand coalition against France. This failed—Napoleon had guarded against this, by a secret treaty with the emperor of Austria. Great efforts were made to relieve Prussia from her fallen situation; but to no effect—Prussia was down, and entangled in a secret treaty with the emperor of France; and the grand coalition against Russia, was formed.

The war in Spain, gave employment for the troops of England; her fleets scoured the coast of Europe, upon the Atlantic and the Baltic, and enforced her system of general blockade; whilst the great internal movements, and military preparations in Austria, Prussia, Poland, Italy and throughout the confederation of the Rhine; together with the preparations in Russia, rendered those countries one great theatre of intrigue and alarm; whilst Spain and European Turkey, were the theatres of desolation and carnage. The intrigues which excited and put in motion all their great plans and operations, extended to America; distracted her councils, inflamed the passions, roused the public feeling, and in addition to the continental system of Dec. 1807, led her into the war.

America, under her neutrality, had become the carriers upon the ocean for the continent of Europe, through this long and desperate struggle ; her flag waved in every sea, and every clime. Her commercial field was truly great, and the harvest was great. The wealth and commerce of America increased beyond all former example. This excited a spirit of envy and jealousy at home and abroad, which endangered her internal peace, and in 1812 entangled her in a war with England.

The continental system of 1807, gave a check to the tide of prosperous and successful commerce in America ; and the war with England, destroyed it, even to the coasting trade, down to the peace of 1815.

The ruin and distress which so suddenly succeeded this unrivalled prosperity of America, were the necessary effects of such opposite extremes ; they were such as the feelings of the nation could express—but not the pen.

If the morals of the nation have been improved, and licentiousness and dissipation checked ; if union, and general harmony have in some measure grown out of this chastisement ; if, as the fruits of a two year's war, America has acquired a naval glory, which shall cause her flag to be more respected hereafter ; she may derive some consolation for all her sufferings, through this long period of distress.

America not only became entangled in the quarrels of Europe, when she adopted the continental system, by her general embargo—but she actually became a party in the grand coalition of 1812, when she declared war against England ; and, painful as this may have been to the nation, it is greatly to be hoped, that a general good has resulted, and will continue to result, which shall fully counterbalance all her sufferings.

We have now unfolded the mysteries of intrigue, which entangled in one general quarrel the whole christian world ; opened the greatest field of military enterprize, produced the greatest distresses, and resulted in the greatest events, of any other war that has ever been recorded.

CHAP. XX.

Commencement of the Russian war—American war—movements in the Russian war—battle of Smolensk—of Borodino—fall and destruction of Moscow.

THE auspicious year 1812 is come ; big with the fate of Napoleon and of France. The emperor of the west, like the main spring of a watch, now put in motion all the vast machine of power, which he had constructed to fix the destinies of Europe. He again renewed his demands on the emperor Alexander, to adopt the continental system, and demanded that Riga should be garrisoned with the troops of France.—These were rejected with that dignity and firmness which distinguished the character of Alexander.

The emperor then called into the field, the armies of Austria and Prussia, as stipulated by treaty, in the year 1811 ; and assembled an army in Prussia and Poland, from all parts of his vast dominions, of French, Austrians, Prussians, Germans, Italians and Poles, of from four to six hundred thousand men, and took up his head quarters at Warsaw.

The emperor of Russia, assembled an army at Wilna, in Poland, to watch the French, under the command of prince Bagration—entered into a convention with England for general safety and defence, sent the Russian fleet to England, to secure it from the French, but more particularly, as a pledge for the general exigencies of the war : opened a negotiation for peace with the Turks, under the influence of England, and repaired to Wilna. Negotiation was soon closed, and both armies took the field.

Here opens the second volume of Charles XII. The emperor moved his grand army to attack the prince at Wilna : the prince retired to Drissa : at the same time, a Prussian army under general M'Donald, penetrated into Russia, by the way of Riga, towards Petersburg.

The emperor Napoleon now saw the two capitals of Russia, (the great objects of his enterprise) in view of expectancy, and began to realise, that this grand movement would fix the fate of Europe, and crown him lord of christendom.

Every movement was announced, by a special bulletin from the emperor Napoleon, proclaiming the advance and successes of the grand army. All Europe, both Turks and christians, were alive to the scene, and anxious for the event.

At this critical moment, America proclaimed war against England, and made a sudden descent upon Canada. Denmark had furnished the fine horses of Hölstein, to fill up the cavalry of the French armies, and the whole christian world were now leagued against Russia and England, excepting Sweden ; she alone remained neuter ; the Turk also withdrew from the war, gave up his advantages, and settled a peace with the emperor Alexander.

Thus armed, thus arranged, the awful, the eventful scene opened. From Drissa, the grand army moved to Polotsk ; the prince again retired to Witepsk ; the emperor advanced ; the prince again retired to Smolensk, and made a stand : the emperor advanced : here the two armies met for the first time, and a severe action ensued ; the Russians fought for their fires and their altars—they were overpowered by numbers, and retired with firmness towards Moscow.

Flushed with the successes of Smolensk, the grand army advanced. On the hills of Borodino, the prince, with some reinforcements, again made a stand. The emperor pursued with a strong column, as his advanced guard, and found the Russians strongly intrenched upon an eminence, under cover of a formidable redoubt, lined with artillery, and determined to await the issue of a battle, in the view of Moscow.

The emperor beheld at a distance, the object of his wishes—Moscow, like a little world, filled all the plain. The French soldiers, fired with the prospect of reaping the spoils of Moscow, as a reward for all their toils, burnt with impatience for the combat.

Nopoleon cherished this ardor ; and before the day closed, commenced a desperate assault upon the grand Russian redoubt, and carried it at the point of the bayonet : the conflict was sharp—but the Russians retired, and left this bulwark of their defence, in the hands of the French ; night closed the scene.

The next day opened a solemn scene.—The two armies in view of each other, passed the day in reconnoitering, and in strengthening their positions, to complete the work of death. Night closed this scene without a blow. The angel of death sat brooding over the night, to indulge in a repose that should serve to heighten the carnage of the morning. The fatal morn appeared : the sun rose clear, and with his first beams, caught the eye of the emperor Napoleon ; who exclaimed with emphasis, “ ’tis the sun of Austerlitz.” Death roused from his slumbers, and opened the scene. Prince Bagration commenced an attack, to recover the redoubt he had lost the preceding day ; a strong Russian column moved to the charge : it was now impregnable ; and vomited forth death into the Russian ranks, and broke the column. Both armies became engaged in the conflict : the ardor and impetuosity of the French, forced the Russians to recoil ; but it was only to concentrate their force, and advance in solid columns to the charge. The conflict now became terrible ; the ardor of the French, and the firmness of the Russians, opened a display of valor and heroism, amidst the thunders of a cannonade, and the carnage of a field, that will ever render memorable, the battle of Borodino ; horrors, which neither the pen nor the pencil can describe. The French retired, and left the field to the defenders of their country ; the great Bagration crowned with his death, the victory of Borodino. The emperor Napoleon drew off his army, to recover his losses ; and published in general orders—“ Soldiers ! This is the first action I ever lost ; you must wipe off the stain, with the blood of the Russians.” The losses in this action were severe upon both sides—but nothing decisive : it had not become the sun of Austerlitz—the stratagem failed. Old prince Kutusoff, who now became the Russian chief, did not pursue the victory ; had he done it, the emperor Napoleon would have brought into action his corps de reserve, and the action would then have become the action of Austerlitz. The scene was reversed :—Kutusoff retired to Moscow, marched through, collected all the treasures and inhabitants of the city, and carried off the fire engines ; and when the emperor of the French entered, the Russians divided into three armies, and invested him in Moscow. Rastapchin, the governor, gave a general notice to the inhabitants, who had made a general preparation for removal ; and in the midst of the triumphs of the emperor, they fired the city : the convicts in the prisons, were set at liberty for this awful scene ; and in one hour, the flames burst forth from all parts, and raged throughout. Thus, this ancient capital of Russia, the pride and boast of Muscovy, a city, ten miles in extent, and thirty or forty miles in circuit, was wrapt in flames, and consumed with one general conflagration, which can neither be conceived of, nor described : the awful sublimity of the scene was strikingly expressed by the emperor Napoleon—" an ocean of flame." But the wealth and splendor of Moscow were soon smoking in ruins—Fatal was the battle of Pultowa, to Charles XII. : fatal was the destruction of Moscow, to the emperor Napoleon.

CONFLAGRATION of MOSCOW.

This stupendous sacrifice restored liberty to Europe, and will probably result in the triumph of the Reformation, and the establishment of the Kingdom of the Stone throughout the world.

CHAP. XXI.

Character of the Russians—overtures of peace—firmness of the emperor Alexander—views of Napoleon—retreat of the French—flight of Napoleon—destruction of the French army—the emperor Napoleon in Paris—again in Saxony at the head of a new army—battle of Leipsic—Napoleon in Paris—successes of Lord Wellington—restoration of the family of Bourbon—Napoleon at Elba—lord Wellington in Paris—Napoleon in Paris—battle of Waterloo—Napoleon in England—at St. Helena—Lewis XVIII. again in Paris—Lord Wellington again in Paris—the empress Maria Louisa, with her little son, at Milan.

THE Russians are the descendants of the ancient Scythians : the war was a Scythian war : and the result, such as has been common to the invasions of Scythia. The French gave a loose reign to all the passions in Moscow ; and rioted amidst the distresses of the scene. The emperor Napoleon took up his quarters in the Kremlin, the citadel of Moscow, and cradle of the Czars of Russia. Here he made overtures of peace to the emperor Alexander : the emperor amused him until he had collected his forces, strengthened his armies, and sent orders for the army of the Danube to advance, in the rear of the French, to intercept their retreat.

This army had been trained to arms, in the successful campaigns against the Turks, in 1810 and 11. Then the emperor Alexander rejected the overture, and published in his manifesto----" I will never make peace, so long as Napoleon, or any of his family, are upon the throne of France."

Napoleon now saw before him the dreadful alternative. That confidence which had led him to the conquest of Moscow, taught him to believe, that he should winter there ; and he had neglected even one solitary preparation to facilitate a retreat. The Russians, on their retreat, laid waste their country ; and what the Russians left, the French army destroyed ; so that the whole extent of way, from Moscow to Polotsk, on the confines of Poland, was literally a desert ; and the Russians were now destroying all the bridges, through all this extent of way. The emperor Napoleon now felt the destruction of Moscow. Instead of rioting, with his army, through the winter, in the spoils of Moscow ;—instead of restoring the ancient sovereignty of Muscovy, placing his brother Louis on the throne of the Czars, who should reign in the north, the great ally of France, humble the emperor Alexander, and bar his sword from all further weight in the great scale of Europe ; instead of returning in the spring with his victorious army into France, to swell the trump of fame with the triumphs of another campaign ; instead of assembling all confederated Europe on the banks of the Danube, and under the protecting sword of his ally of Muscovy (this contemplated shield of the north) marching at the head of his legions to the banks of the Hellespont, and planting his eagles on the walls of Constantinople ; may I yet say, instead of triumphing over Asia and America, and erecting his standard upon the ruins of the liberties of man ; this hero of Borodino and of Moscow, became the hero of a different scene. He wreaked his vengeance on the Kremlin, by blowing up, and destroying the cradle of the ancient sovereigns of Muscovy ; collected the remaining treasures of Moscow, and took up his retreat, in order to recover his former position in Poland. His first movements were regular ; but the assembled armies of Russia, under that old veteran, prince Kutusoff, fired with revenge for the smoking ruins of their country, pressed on his rear, and soon overtook the spoil-incumbered foe. Torn with a succession of murderous conflicts ; galled by the distressing ravages of the Cossacs ; stung with the severities of a Russian winter ; this conqueror became a fugitive stripped of his artillery and baggage by the death of his horses, the spoils of Moscow fell into the hands of the Russians. Pressed by the Russians, murdered by the Cossacs, the retreat of the French became the flight of a confused mass, without order, without discipline, without supplies, a prey to death in every form ; destroyed by, and destroying, every thing in their route. He who so late had been the idol, now became the reproach of this wreck of an army ; himself no longer safe in the midst of these fugitives, he now became a fugitive and deserted his myrmidons in the midst of death. On the confines of Krasnoy, on the banks of the Dnieper, Napoleon fled; fled in disguise; and fled alone! just at the time, when the army of the Danube appeared in his rear to intercept his flight. Language cannot paint, imagination cannot conceive of the distresses of the scenes that followed; suffice it to say, that this mighty force, which under the appellation of the grand army, had marched into Russia victorious; when it reached Poland, had vanished "like the baseless fabric of a vision, and left not a wreck behind."

The army of Prussia which entered Russia by the way of Riga, returned entire, and the army of Austria separated from the grand army in the retreat, and returned with great loss; but escaped ruin. Napoleon repaired to Paris, as Charles XII. returned through Germany; assembled his senate, disclosed his losses, and put the Empire under a fresh requisition, for men, money, and arms; in two months, assembled a new army, put himself at their head, and took the field in Saxony. The emperor of Russia, in the mean time, entered Prussia, and joined the king, with his victorious army; the emperor of Austria entered Bohemia, with one hundred thousand men, as mediator for his son in law, Napoleon. The allies brought into the field Bernadotte, prince of Pontecorvo, now crown prince of Sweden; with an army of one hundred thousand men, to enter the lists with Napoleon his old master. This Bernadotte was a distinguished general in the Prussian war of 1806—7, in the service of the emperor of France, and was elected crown prince of Sweden, when in the French service, upon the deposition of Gustavus IV.

The sovereigns of Russia and Prussia, took up their headquarters at Dresden, in Saxony. Prince Bernadotte, took the field, at the head of his Swedes; the emperor Napoleon was encamped at Leipsic. Balanced in this awful state of suspense, the armies awaited the decision of the emperor of Austria. When they were ready for action, his mediation was closed; he declared for the allies, against his son in law Napoleon, and the conflict began. The thunders of Borodino were renewed upon the plains of Leipsic, the conflict was desperate, and the carnage terrible. The French were true to their emperor; but the contest was unequal: overpowered by numbers, they gave way, fled in disorder, and were butchered and destroyed, with a horrible slaughter.

The brave general Moreau, who had returned from America, and joined the crown prince of Sweden, fell in the heat of the action. The three sovereigns of Russia, Austria and Prussia, beheld the awful scene from their quarters, and when the victory was announced, they fell on their knees, and gave thanks to God. Napoleon, with the shattered remains of his army, fled into France, and repaired to Paris, assembled the wreck of his army, and prepared for his defence; the allies of Russia, Austria and Prussia, pursued into France, invested Napoleon in Paris, and took him by capitulation; stripped him of his crowns, and banished him to the island of Elba.

They next subdued the French forces in the west of Germany, established the sovereignty of Holland, and restored the Stadtholder. The English, Portuguese and Spaniards, recovered Portugal and Spain—drove out king Joseph, and entered France victorious, under the duke of Wellington, to co-operate with the allies in the conquest of Napoleon. The allies restored the Bourbon family in the person of Lewis XVIII. ; established a strong force at Paris, under the duke of Wellington ; the emperor of Russia, and king of Prussia, visited England—retired to Vienna, and formed a congress to settle the claims of the several powers, for their losses in the war.

Nothing had ever appeared in Europe like the violence of the French revolution. It had overthrown the ancient civil and religious establishments, destroyed the ancient balance of power, changed many of the ancient limits and boundaries ; involved all the states in enormous debts, and laid the foundation for a labyrinth of claims. The congress of Vienna had spent six months in settling the difficulties which had arisen, when they were roused from their sitting, as by a clap of thunder, with the news, “ that Napoleon was in Paris, and at the head of the army.” Struck with alarm they closed their sitting, repaired to the head of their armies, and took the field.

The Russian and Austrian armies took their position upon the Rhine, on the east of France, to guard the bridge of Strasburg. The English and Prussian armies were posted in Flanders, with the English army in advance, twenty or thirty miles. One French army lay on the east to watch the Russians and Austrians, and another in Flanders to watch the English and Prussians. The emperor fortified his capital, and attempted to renew the conscription, but this failed. France had long been tired of this wasting conduit, through which the blood of her sons had flowed so freely—he saw himself deserted by the nation, but supported by the armies.

His plans were fixed : he left Paris in the night, (according to his usual custom,) put himself at the head of the army of the north, and commenced an attack upon the English army, under lord Wellington, with expectations of destroying this army at a blow ; then the Prussian army at another blow ; and then the armies of Russia and Austria would have fallen an easy conquest to the united forces of the victorious emperor, and his popularity would have enabled him to renew the conscription.

The allies had set for this old fox, his own trap of Austerlitz and Borodino. He commenced a furious assault upon lord Wellington—his lordship had seen the French in Spain—he received the charge of the French with firmness : the conflict was severe and obstinate ; the English retired, and resisted as they retired ; the Prussians advanced, and the action continued. On the second day, the allies formed a junction—the action became general, and the carnage was great. On the third day, the action was renewed : the French, exhausted with the long conflict, and overpowered by numbers, gave way : Napoleon rallied to the charge, again and again ; the conflict became desperate—the allies opened a battery of artillery upon the centre of the army of Napoleon—the destruction was terrible ; he drew up his guards to support his centre ; they fell almost to a man : Napoleon exclaimed to the officer near him “ ’tis time for us to go.” He fled into France, and left his army to their fate ; resigned his crown to his son ; made for the sea-coast ; delivered himself up to the captain of an English ship ; and was conveyed to England.

The allies assembled at Paris ; restored Lewis XVIII. ; established again the duke of Wellington, with a strong force to protect the king—secured the tranquillity of Europe. The sovereigns again retired to Vienna ; opened their congress, and sentenced Napoleon to the Island of St. Helena, for life.

The empress Maria Louisa, (upon the first invasion of France by the allies in 1813,) retired with her son into Italy, took up her abode at Milan, and devoted herself to the care of her son ; who is now considered by many as heir apparent to the throne of France, upon the demise of Lewis XVIII.

CHAP. XXII.

General affairs of Christendom.

THE storm which burst upon the world in the French revolution, commenced in May, 1789, and raged without intermission down to the year 1815. This tempest not only overthrew the governments of France, Spain, Portugal, Holland, Germany, Switzerland, and the States of Italy; but shook to their centres all the other governments in Christendom, and threatened to prostrate the world to the dominion of France.

When the allied sovereigns triumphed over the emperor of France at the battle of Waterloo, and banished him to the island of St. Helena, for life, the storm was completely broken; but the tempestuous sea of Europe has continued to swell and rage, from the terrible effects of the storm, down to the present time.

Although the allied sovereigns resumed their congress at Vienna, at the close of the war, to finish the adjustment of all the contested claims, which rose out of the war; and although they united in the confederacy, styled the Holy League, in 1816, for the suppression of wars, and the promotion of peace; yet the passions of men have been impatient of controul, and bid defiance to their power.

In 1820 a revolution commenced in Spain, that shook the nation to its foundations, and threatened the subversion of the government.—The people rose in arms throughout the kingdom, and entered Madrid in triumph. The King, (Ferdinand VII.) to appease the rage of the popular fury, swore to maintain, and preserve the constitution of 1812; and thus sanctioned the spirit of the day. This constitution then went into operation, and continues to this time; but the conflicting passions of the nation have not become tranquil.

In 1821 the national Cortez decreed the abolition of the inquisition, together with all the religious cloisters, and confiscated their estates. They also decreed the liberty of the press.

These were amongst the first acts of the French revolution, and opened the way for all their subsequent calamities. Similar effects may possibly result, ultimately, from similar causes in Spain.

Pending these events in Spain, a similar scene was opened in Portugal, and similar consequences followed, and continue to follow. The two nations may still be considered in a revolutionary state.

The kingdom of Naples caught the revolutionary fire, which burst forth in a mighty blaze. The people, as in Spain, rose in arms, and threatened the subversion of the government ; but the house of Austria interposed with a strong military force, supported the king, and at the point of the bayonet hushed the storm. Peace and tranquillity were restored, and continue to prevail.

Pending these convulsions on the continent of Europe, the patriots of South America seized the auspicious moment, rose in arms, asserted their rights, and after a long and arduous struggle, shook off the Spanish yoke, and secured to themselves their just rights amongst the free and independent nations of the earth.

Mexico followed the example of the kingdoms in South America ; rose in arms, shook off the Spanish yoke, and established her independence, 1821.

Pending these mighty struggles for liberty in Europe and America, the fever of revolution broke out in England, under the mask of radical reform, and threatened the subversion of the monarchy.

In the midst of this storm, queen Caroline, who had been rejected by her husband, when Prince of Wales, and become a traveller upon the continent, appeared in England, and became the rallying point for the revolutionists. This threw the nation into a high state of agitation, and the Queen, to revenge on her husband, fanned the flame.

To allay this storm, a trial was instituted against the Queen, upon the statute of pains and penalties, which spun out to a great length ; the nation was convulsed, and the king tottered upon his throne. To appease the popular rage, and lay the storm, the trial of the Queen was closed, by an adjournment for six months, and the nation became calm.

The King embraced the favorable moment, and caused a day to be proclaimed for his public coronation. This diverted the attention of all parties, and the passions of the people were swallowed up in the splendid shew of a coronation day, July, 1821. The Queen was rejected.

This shock was more than the Queen could sustain ; she sunk under the disappointment, and with her death sealed the tranquillity of the nation. Her remains were removed to Germany, and deposited with those of her friends of the illustrious house of Brunswick.

To close this solemn scene, the great Napoleon, emperor of France, and conqueror of Europe, died in his confinement upon the Island of St. Helena.* “Yet he shall come to his end and none shall help him.”—Daniel xi. 45.

* The following is an interesting account given by Dr. Antomarchi, Napoleon's Physician.

“Bonaparte occupied himself often with gardening; and under his immediate superintendance, bowers and grottoes were erected in his garden at Longwood. Gen. Bertrand, Madame Bertrand, with the children, and Dr. Antomarchi, assisted him on such occasions. His usual dress was that of a Chinese gardener: nankins and a large straw hat. Within the last eight months of his life he could scarcely move out, and was obliged either to rest on the sofa, or in his easy chair; he suffered considerably, and was, in consequence, considerably morose; he had lost full two thirds of his corpulence.

“During his illness his son was the principal topic of his conversation; he never conversed on politics, at least the Doctor said so. Two priests were sent to him by his mother, one an old man, (Buonavita) and the other a young man. Since their arrival mass was read every day at Longwood, and the Doctor said “It est en bon Cretien.” Bonaparte expressed much disgust at the old priest's smelling of tobacco—he disliked smoking and smokers. He had entirely left off taking snuff. You have seen it noticed in the papers that he sent a present to lady Holland. The circumstances that led to it are highly honorable to her ladyship. Lady Holland was never personally known to Bonaparte, but since his confinement she had been unremitting in her attention to him, by constantly providing him with articles for his table, which she thought would be agreeable to him; also by sending him books, and contributing by many other ways to his domestic comfort. He sent her a Cameo of great value, as a token of gratitude; it was on a snuff box which the Pope presented to Napoleon.

“The veneration with which the Doctor spoke of him is beyond any thing of the sort I ever witnessed. Speaking of Bertrand, he always styles him (le grand Marechal.) Madam Bertrand was always allowed to enter his room without being announced. Napoleon was quite resigned to die at St. Helena—he often conversed with Antomarchi of events of his earliest age, and recollected the most trifling acts of his childhood. The Doctor being a native of Corsica, they generally conversed together in the idiom of the island, which was quite familiar to Napoleon. The house at Longwood was exceedingly small and uncomfortable, and damp beyond conception; the new house was not yet finished, and it was Bonaparte's intention, had he lived, never to inhabit it.”

Pending these convulsions of christendom, an insurrection broke out in Turkey in Europe, which gave serious alarm to the sublime Porte, and still threatens to prostrate the crescent, and subvert the government.

The Greeks who were the immediate instruments of this insurrection, have maintained a desperate conflict, in the unequal strife, and the Emperors of Russia and Austria, have given them all such support, as could be afforded without open hostilities.

Persia is said to have availed herself of these commotions in Europe, and opened a war upon Turkey on the east, for the purpose of recovering her ancient possessions, and humbling the gigantic power of Turkey.

What will be the issue of these mighty events, time only can unfold.*

During the continuance of these eventful struggles in Europe, Asia, and South America, the affairs of the United States continue to roll on prosperously.

The successful close of the Seminole war in 1818, opened the way for the cession of the Floridas to the United States, and the settlement of the boundary line between the United States and Spanish America, and hushed the storm which threatened the peace of the two nations, by an amicable adjustment, 1821.

The strife of party which raised the storm in Congress upon the Missouri question, and arrayed the north against the south, was amicably settled by the admission of the state of Missouri into the Union in 1821.

The conflicts of party in the United States, have hitherto been overruled in great wisdom; they have enlightened the people, and strengthened the government.

Amidst the numerous improvements of the United States, none have appeared of equal magnitude with the great northern and western canals of the state of New-York. The first has opened a communication between the Hudson and St. Lawrence, and the latter between the Hudson and Mississippi, and rendered the city of New-York the great local point of commerce for North America. This will also render her the London of America.

SOVEREIGNS OF EUROPE.

SOVEREIGNS OF ENGLAND.

WE have noticed in our remarks upon England, the decided sovereignty of the island, at and before the Roman invasion; that during the period of nearly five centuries, the Romans kept the peace between the petty sovereigns, and when they withdrew their power, the Saxons, under Hengis and Horsa, seized on the island; and subdued all these small hordes under the dominion of the Heptarchy, and thus laid the foundation of the representative government.

The union of this Heptarchy, under Alfred the great, was also noticed, who may be fairly styled the first English monarch, and laid the foundation of the government.	880	Henry III.	1216

SCOTLAND.

THE antiquity of Scotland's Kings stands unrivalled in Europe ; she boasts her royal line of Kings, from Fergus I. ; who settled in Scotland as early as the subversion of the Medo-Persian empire, by Alexander ; three hundred and thirty years before Christ. She claims a regular succession of one hundred and fifteen Kings, through a period of one thousand nine hundred and thirty-two years, down to the time of her union with England, under James I. 1602 ; and from thence to the confirmed union of 1707, when the crown of Scotland was united with the crown of England under the title of Great Britain.

The history of this nation, in connexion with the history of England, has claimed and received our attention A list of her Kings, would swell the size of this work without advantage ; since her political existence has become incorporated with England.
